Index locorum

This index strives to be illustrative rather than exhaustive. Incidental citations of passages or phrases in Cicero (especially Brutus and de Oratore) and Catullus are generally not included in what follows. Citations of works that appear in the footnotes – lists of individual passages or entire works that support the argument at hand but are not central to it (thus their placement in the footnotes) – tend not to be included. I have made some exceptions to this, however, especially for citations from Greek works, and when the use of a citation as a comparandum may aid the argument as a whole. I hope to have restricted what follows to those citations, and the discussions surrounding them, that will be most useful to the reader.

Index rerum et nominum

Names, concepts, and terms mentioned in passing, and names of literary characters, are generally omitted. Brief citations of oft-cited texts (Brutus, de Oratore) and incidental citations of texts in general, are not included; terms that may easily be gleaned from the Table of Contents (otium; munus; uendibilis, etc.) tend not to be included. References in footnotes are included only if they seem to add to the argument as a whole.
