Historical Perspectives on Modern Economics

English historical economics, 1870 – 1926
Historical Perspectives on Modern Economics

General Editor: Professor Craufurd D. Goodwin, Duke University

This series contains original works that challenge and enlighten historians of economics. For the profession as a whole it promotes a better understanding of the origin and content of modern economics.

Other books in the series
Don Lavoie: Rivalry and central planning: The Socialist calculation debate reconsidered
Takashi Negishi: Economic theories in a non-Walrasian tradition
E. Roy Weintraub: General equilibrium analysis: Studies in appraisal
William J. Barber: From new era to New Deal: Herbert Hoover, the economists, and American economic policy, 1921–1933
English historical economics,
1870 – 1926

The rise of economic history and neomercantilism

Gerard M. Koot
Southeastern Massachusetts University
Contents

Acknowledgements vii
Introduction 1

1 The crisis of classical political economy and attempts at reconstruction, 1870–1885 10

2 Foreigners, forerunners, and the Irish contribution to historical economics 32

3 Statistics, historical economics, and economic history 60

4 Historical economics at Oxford 83

5 W. J. Ashley: the English socialist of the chair and the evolution of capitalism 102

6 Historical economics at Marshall’s Cambridge: H. S. Foxwell and the irregularity of capitalism 122

7 Economic history and neomercantilism: William Cunningham and J. S. Nicholson 135

8 W. A. S. Hewins and the Webbs: applied economics, economic history, and the LSE 160

9 Conclusion and epilogue 187
Notes 212
Selected bibliography 260
Index 269
Acknowledgments

This study would not have reached fruition if it had not been for the encouragement and advice I received from Professor Bernard Semmel, State University of New York at Stony Brook, and Professor A.W. Coats, the University of Nottingham. Professor Semmel first suggested the subject to me and encouraged my work in the history of economic thought. The intellectual framework of this work owes much to his insights in British intellectual and social history. Professor Coats urged me to pay greater attention to the institutional framework in which the historical economists found themselves. Both have read several versions of the manuscript, made many valuable suggestions, and saved me from many errors. Without their advice and friendship, this study would not have been completed. I also owe a special debt to Professor Elizabeth Durbin of New York University. Her painstaking review of the manuscript has done much to strengthen its argument.

Thanks is also due to the kind critics, especially the members of the Society for the History of Economic Thought on both sides of the Atlantic and in Australia, who have helped formulate my ideas. I am especially grateful to Mr. Paul Sturgis, Loughborough University, who pointed me to manuscript material early in the project. My colleague, Professor James Hijiya, in the History Department at Southeastern Massachusetts University kindly helped with matters of style. Archivists and librarians in the United States and the United Kingdom have not only allowed me to use material in their stewardship, but have also pointed me in new directions. I am particularly grateful to those at the British Library of Political and Economic Science, the Kress Library of Business and Economics at Harvard University, the Marshall Library in Cambridge, as well as the many others who permitted me to use the manuscript collections listed in the bibliography.

Various drafts of the manuscript were typed by Ms. Cheryl Phillips and Ms. Judy Veiga of Southeastern Massachusetts University. They performed an often difficult task with efficiency and good humor. Financial aid for various parts of the study was received from the Kress Library of Business and Economics at Harvard University, the National viii Acknowledgments

Endowment for the Humanities, and Southeastern Massachusetts University.

Finally, I owe the greatest debt to my family. My parents, to whose memory the work is dedicated, made the sacrifices and provided the inspiration which allowed their son to attend a University. My wife, Sheila, whose confidence, support, and affection encouraged me to pursue my interests. My sons, Michael and Christian, who watched its progress with a bemused interest and enjoyed the travel it entailed.

G.M.K.
August 1987
Southeastern Massachusetts University
North Dartmouth, MA.