ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The breadth of this book's concerns has created debts both wide and deep. My conception of "primary" oral epic poetry, and of the heroic culture with which it deals, has been formed by H. M. Chadwick's The Heroic Age, C. M. Bowra's Heroic Poetry, and A. B. Lord's The Singer of Tales. Bowra's From Virgil to Milton, E. M. W. Tillyard's The English Epic and Its Background, and Maurice McNamee's Homer and the Epic Hero have shaped my understanding of the evolution of "secondary" literary epic. Four surveys of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century attitudes toward the epic poem have been invaluable: Stuart Curran's Poetic Form and British Romanticism, Norman Foerster's The Fortunes of Epic Poetry, H. T. Swedenberg's The Theory of the Epic in England 1650-1800, and Brian Wilkie's Romantic Poets and Epic Tradition. Among studies of American literature that treat the early national period, I am especially indebted to Leon Howard's The Connecticut Wits, Benjamin Spencer's The Quest for Nationality, and Lawrence Buell's New England Literary Culture. My point of departure has been the cumulative findings of Roy Harvey Pearce's "The Long View: An American Epic" (in The Continuity of American Poetry), James E. Miller's The American Quest for a Supreme Fiction, and Michael Bernstein's The Tale of the Tribe. Although I dispute their confining of epic to poetry, this book could not exist without their remarkable abilities to formulate and to explore a very real tradition of its own. I wish I could have benefited more fully from George Dekker's The American Historical Romance, published while this book was in press.

Barnes and Noble granted permission to revise my essay "Red Achilles, Red Satan: Cooper and the American Indian Epic” for inclusion in the fifth chapter. Farrar, Straus, and Giroux granted permission to quote a passage from Tom Wolfe’s The Bonfire of the Vanities. For the time needed to complete research and writing, I am grateful to the National Endowment for the Humanities and to Middlebury College. Cynthia Ketcham, Karen Benfield, and the editors of Cambridge University Press have helped immeasurably in preparing and checking the final manuscript.

I should like to thank colleagues, correspondents, and friends who have provided particular points of information, qualified my oversimplifications, and given me the great gift of their reading time: Eve Adler, Alicia Andreu, Barbara Bellows, Lawrence Buell, Stuart Curran, George Dekker, Stepehn Donadio, Albert Gelpi, Dustin Griffin, Albert Lord, John McCardell, Elizabeth Napier, Joel Porte, Kenneth Silverman, Lewis Simpson, John Wilders, and Joseph Wittreich.

The joy that Mireille, Christopher, and Isabel have brought into my life is beyond my power to express.
