Acknowledgments

I would like to single out four persons who have been especially helpful in writing these essays. Of course, many others have made comments and criticisms. They are thanked (many of them many times) in the individual essays. This special space I would like to reserve for these people, who not only have helped with specific essays but also contributed generally to my education.

First, I would like to thank Robert Solow. Each of the models in this volume is a short statement that focuses on a problem. This method of economic theory was taught by Solow to a generation of graduate students at MIT via the medium of growth models. Through his students his influence has gone far beyond his own original contributions. I am proud to be one of these students.

“The Market for ‘Lemons’” was written in my first year at Berkeley, 1966–67. It might not have been written without the encouragement of Thomas Rothenberg. And it might not have been published without his constructive criticisms, especially in phrasing the proofs in terms of supply and demand. His help went far beyond that expected of a colleague, or even a good friend.

Michael Rothschild was the editor of the symposium that published “The Economics of Caste and of the Rat Race and Other Woeful Tales.” He gave me great trouble. He did not like the early versions. He made painstaking comments, and the paper improved. I learned a lot from him about how to write an essay of the sort published in this volume. His teachings went beyond the specific help on the specific essay.

Finally, in this special list, Janet Yellen has listened to my problems for the last six years. The last five essays here were all written under her influence. She has encouraged my writing and also dissuaded me from working on things that would have been mistakes. For personal reasons, far in addition to her invaluable helpfulness with this work, I would like to dedicate this book to her.
