ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I am indebted to a number of institutions for help in my work on this book. The Horace H. Rackham School of Graduate Studies and the Center for Russian and East European Studies of The University of Michigan have provided generous assistance over the years. A summer research grant from the American Council of Learned Societies gave crucial support at an early stage. A Fulbright – Hays fellowship enabled me to spend the year 1969 in Oxford, England, where I worked as a visiting fellow at St. Antony's College.

A great many individuals have helped in a great many ways. Most numerous are my students – and especially graduate students – with whom I have tried out most of the ideas in this book, and who have shared their ideas with me. My debt to my colleagues in the Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures at The University of Michigan is large. Every one of them, at one time or another, has been helpful. Some of the material in the chapters on poetry is adapted from an article written in collaboration with Professor Mark Suino. Six persons read the manuscript in its penultimate version, and each of them made valuable corrections and suggestions. They are Patricia Carden of Cornell University; Max Hayward of St. Antony's College, Oxford; Geoffrey Hosking of The University of Essex; David Lapeza of The University of Michigan; Lev Lifshitz of The University of Michigan; and Richard Sheldon of Dartmouth College. I cannot thank them enough. I am particularly indebted to Max Hayward for his friendship and encouragement over the years, and for his example of wise and rigorous scholarship. My most constant and valuable helper has been the lovely and brilliant woman to whom this book is dedicated.
