The German Problem Reconsidered
It is characteristic of the Germans that the question: “What is German?” never dies out among them.

Preface

This book, whatever its shortcomings, has benefited greatly from the assistance of others. If good advice has not always been taken, it has always been freely given. Thanks to The Lehrman Institute in New York, the chapters have been presented in draft form before a seminar of historians and other German experts. Many of the participants have been kind enough to write detailed commentaries. In particular, I should like to thank Hans Gatzke, Peter Katzenstein, Fritz Stern, and Henry Turner, as well as my old friends and colleagues at the Institute, Harold van Buren Cleveland, Robert Heilbroner, Lewis Lehrman, and Nicholas Rizopoulos.

Kendall Myers, Edward Keeton, and Robert Skidelsky, colleagues and former colleagues at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, have been no less generous. I am particularly grateful to Stephen Schucker, of Brandeis University and S.A.I.S., for his advice on the manuscript's final version. A long list of students and research assistants have made major contributions, in particular Jacqueline Tammenoms-Bakker, Jordan Barab, John Berger, Andreas Credé, David Haettenschwiler, John Harper, Marnix Krop, Eric Melby, and Prescott Wurlitzer. The dissertations of four of my students – Robert Dahlberg, Simon Newman, Francis Rome, and Benjamin Rowland – have greatly contributed to the further education of their professor and to this book in particular.

Another important source of advice and criticism has been two distinguished German scholars at the University of Cologne, Hans-Peter Schwarz and Andreas Hillgruber. Both read the manuscript in an early draft and went out of their way to make numerous helpful comments. My thanks, too, for the good advice of my friends Wolfram Hanrieder, Eckehard Loecke, and Joan Cleveland.

My researches in Germany have been greatly helped by the hospitality of Professor Kurt Sontheimer at the Geschwister-Scholl-Institut at the University of Munich, and that of Karl Kaiser and Wolfgang Hager at the Forschungs-institut für Auswärtige Politik in Bonn. Interviews with German businessmen, civil servants, journalists, politicians, and scholars, too numerous to mention, have been indispensable in helping me understand the contemporary German economic and political situation. I thank all those busy people for their kind and patient help. For the time and funds for these researches, I can thank the Johns Hopkins University, the Fulbright Commission, and my friend, Lewis Lehrman.

For the usual vast labors of typing and checking drafts, I thank my student assistants, and, in particular, Jordan Barab, who prepared the index, also my secretary, Winifred Williams, and the secretaries at the Lehrman Institute, Betty Gurchick, Dida Porecki, and Carol Rath. For her usual careful editing and advice, my thanks also to May Wu at the Lehrman Institute.

Finally, despite this rather gregarious process, writing a book is a lonely and exasperating affair. For providing so warm a home for me in Germany, and for their innumerable insights into the country and its people, I thank my brother, Patrick, and his wife, Lynn. To these brief personal acknowledgments, I must add the support and forbearance of my wife, Avis.
