THE CAMBRIDGE
ANCIENT HISTORY

SECOND EDITION
VOLUME XII

The Crisis of Empire,
A.D. 193–337

Edited by ALAN K. BOWMAN
Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford

PETER GARNSEY
Professor of the History of Classical Antiquity in the University of Cambridge

AVERIL CAMERON
Warden of Keble College, Oxford
CONTENTS

List of maps  page xi
List of text-figures  xii
Preface  xiii

PART I NARRATIVE

1 The Severan dynasty  1
   by Brian Campbell, Professor of Roman History, School of History (Ancient History), The Queen’s University of Belfast
   I The background and accession of Septimius Severus  1
   II Civil and foreign wars  4
   III Severus, the army and the senate  9
   IV Caracalla  15
   V The end of the dynasty  20

2 Maximinus to Diocletian and the ‘crisis’  28
   by John Drinkwater, Emeritus Professor, Department of Classics, University of Nottingham
   I Introduction  28
   II Narrative  28
   III Discussion  58

3 Diocletian and the first tetrarchy, A.D. 284–305  67
   by Alan K. Bowman, Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford
   I The accession of Diocletian and the appointment of Maximian  68
   II The years 286–92  70
   III The creation of the tetrarchy  74
   IV The period of the tetrarchy, 293–305  78
   V Conclusion  88
CONTENTS

4 The reign of Constantine, a.d. 306–337
by Averil Cameron, Warden of Keble College, The University of Oxford

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>PART II GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>5 The army</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
by Brian Campbell
I Change and continuity | 110 |
II The military reforms of Diocletian and Constantine | 120 |
6 The emperor and his administration | 131 |
6a General developments | 131 |
by Elio Lo Cascio, Università degli Studi di Napoli Federico II
6b The age of the Severans | 137 |
by Elio Lo Cascio
I Imperial designation and legitimation: the problem of succession | 137 |
II The domus Augusta and the dynastic ideology | 140 |
III The role of the army and the plebs urbana in imperial legitimation | 141 |
IV The administration: the centre and the periphery | 142 |
V The praetorian prefecture and the jurists | 147 |
VI The development of the procuratorships | 148 |
VII The new organization of imperial estates and finances | 150 |
6c The government and administration of the empire in the central decades of the third century | 156 |
by Elio Lo Cascio
I Designation of the emperor and succession during the fifty years of the anarchy | 156 |
II Gallienus' reforms: military command and the government of the provinces | 158 |
III The city of Rome from the Severans to Aurelian | 162 |
IV Italy moving towards provincialization | 165 |
6d The new state of Diocletian and Constantine: from the tetrarchy to the reunification of the empire | 170 |
by Elio Lo Cascio
I The new legitimation of imperial power | 170 |

CONTENTS  vii

II The reforms and the administrative organization of the empire  172
III Provinces, dioceses and prefectures  179
IV Later developments  181

7a High classical law  184
by DAVID IBBETSON, Regius Professor of Civil Law, University of Cambridge

7b Epiclassical law  200
by DAVID JOHNSTON, Advocate's Library, Edinburgh
I Rescripts, jurists and the chancery  201
II Codes  202
III Epiclassical jurists  204
IV Jurists in the schools  206
V Conclusion  207

PART III THE PROVINCES  212

8 Provinces and frontiers  212
by JOHN WILKES, Emeritus Professor, Institute of Archaeology, University College London
I Frontier history  212
II Emperors and provinces  233
III Frontier organization  252

9 Developments in provincial and local administration  269
by JEAN-MICHEL CARRIÉ, École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales, Paris
I Introduction  269
II The imperial state and its 'provincials'  271
III The cities in the service of the functioning of the imperial state  282
IV The fate of the municipal world: crisis or adaptation?  293
V Conclusion  309

10 Egypt from Septimius Severus to the death of Constantine  313
by ALAN K. BOWMAN
I Prologue  313
II Egypt in the context of the empire  315
III The province and its administration  316
IV Society and economy  322
PART IV THE ECONOMY OF THE EMPIRE

11 Coinage and taxation: the state’s point of view, A.D. 193–337
   by Mireille Corbier, Director of L’Année Epigraphique, CNRS, Paris
   I Coin issues and devaluations
   II The metal stock
   III Taxation
   IV The modes of public spending
   V Conclusion

12 Coinage, society and economy
   by Mireille Corbier
   I The structures of the economy
   II The state and the evolution of the economy in the ‘long’ third century: problems of interpretation
   III Did the economic unity of the empire become fragmented?

PART V THE NON-ROMAN WORLD

13 The Germanic peoples and Germanic society by Malcolm Todd, Emeritus Professor of Archaeology in the University of Durham, and former Principal of Trevelyan College, Durham
   I New groupings
   II Settlements
   III Warfare
   IV Trade and technology

14 The Sassanians
   by Richard N. Frye, Professor Emeritus, Harvard University
   I Introduction
   II The early Sassanians
   III Sassanian relations with the Romans
   IV Religious developments
   V Conclusions

15 Armenia and the eastern marches
   by C.S. Lightfoot, Department of Greek and Roman Art, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York
CONTENTS ix

I Introduction 481
II The Armenian kingdom 483
III The marches 489
IV Outline history 491

16 The Arabs and the desert peoples 498

by MAURICE SARTRE, Professeur d’Histoire Ancienne à l’Université François-Rabelais

I The unity and diversity of Arab society 498
II The apogee and ruin of the client states 507
III Phylarchs and allied nomad kings 515

PART VI RELIGION, CULTURE AND SOCIETY

17 Late polytheism 521

17a The world-view 521

by GARTH FOWDEN, Centre for Greek and Roman Antiquity, National Research Foundation, Athens

I Problems around Plotinus 523
II Hermetism and theurgy 529
III Magic and astrology 533

17b The individual and the gods 538

by GARTH FOWDEN

I Shrines and cults 538
II Special relationships 543
III Gods of hearth and grave 551

17c Public religion 553

by GARTH FOWDEN

I The role of the emperor 553
II Regional perspectives 561
III Conclusion 570

18a Christianity, A.D. 70–192 573

by MARK EDWARDS, Lecturer in Patristics, University of Oxford
CONTENTS

18b Third-century Christianity 589
by Graeme Clarke, Visiting Fellow, School of Social Sciences, Australian National University, Canberra
I Geographical coverage 589
II Christians and the Roman state 616
III Persecution of Decius 625
IV Persecution under Gallus 635
V Persecution under Valerian and Gallienus 637
VI The Great Persecution 647
VII Christian literature of the third century 665

19 Art and architecture, a.d. 193–337 672
by Janet Huskinson, The Open University
I Introduction 672
II Art and architecture, a.d. 193–337: a survey 673
III Conclusion 702

Appendices to chapter 8 704
by John Wilkes
I Changes in Roman provincial organization, a.d. 193–337 705
II Imperial movements, a.d. 193–337 714
III Frontier deployment, a.d. 193–337 724

Stemmata 768
Compiled by Brian Campbell and Simon Corcoran

Chronology 772
Bibliography 786
Abbreviations 786
Frequently cited works 793
Part I: Narrative (chapters 1–4) 799
Part II: Government and administration (chapters 5–7) 819
Part III: The provinces (chapters 8–10) 834
Part IV: The economy of the empire (chapters 11–12) 852
Part V: The non-Roman world (chapters 13–16) 871
Part VI: Religion, culture and society (chapters 17–19) 885

Index 900
MAPS

Map 1 is positioned at the end of the book.

4. The Rhine–Danube limes in the late second century
5. Egypt in the early fourth century
6. The Sassanian empire
7. Armenia and the eastern marches
8. The Arabs and the desert people
TEXT-FIGURES

   page 675

2 Two tetrarchs from porphyry group, Venice. German Archaeological Institute in Rome, neg. no. 68.5152

3 Arch of Septimius Severus, Rome. Alinari/Art Resource, New York, 5835

4 Panel from arch of Argentarii, Rome, showing Septimius Severus and Julia Domna sacrificing. German Archaeological Institute in Rome, neg. no. 70.993

5 'Ludovisi' sarcophagus. German Archaeological Institute in Rome, neg. no. 58.2011

6 Frieze from arch of Constantine showing Constantine giving money and Hadrianic roundels above. Alinari/Art Resource, New York, 17325

7 Portrait of Caracalla. New York Metropolitan Museum, museum photo 40.11.1a

9 Ostia, black and white mosaic. From J. Clarke, Roman Black and White Figural Mosaics (New York 1979), fig. 58, by permission of Michael Lavery

10 North African circus mosaic from Carthage. German Archaeological Institute in Rome, neg. no. 61.543

LINE DRAWINGS

b Schematic plan of four faces of the arch of Constantine with the arrangement of the reliefs and their sources. From J. Elsner, Imperial Rome and Christian Triumph (Oxford, 1998), by permission of Oxford University Press

xii
PREFACE

The twelfth volume of the first edition of The Cambridge Ancient History, the last of that series, appeared in 1938 and was entitled ‘Imperial Crisis and Recovery’, taking as its terminal dates the accession of Septimius Severus in 193 and the defeat of Licinius by Constantine in A.D. 324. The editors thus chose to exclude from its purview the period of Constantine’s sole rule and the foundation of Constantinople and, in doing so, they made an implicit statement about what they regarded as key events or crucial stages in the history of the later Roman empire and the transition to the Byzantine and the medieval world. The centrality of the idea of the transition is itself reflected both in the editors’ preface to the volume and in the list of contents, as well as explicitly in several of the individual chapters.

As is appropriate to the nature and purpose of The Cambridge Ancient History, the new edition of Volume XII reflects the differences in viewpoint and emphasis which have developed in the period since the publication of its predecessor, as well as the accretion of new evidence. We have chosen the same starting-point as our predecessors, the accession of Septimius Severus, but we close this volume at the end of the reign of Constantine (A.D. 337), a choice partly but not solely determined by the fact that the Press took the decision, at about the time when Volumes X, XI and XII were being planned, to add two extra volumes (XIII and XIV) to the series in order to take the story down to A.D. 600. It seemed, on several counts, more satisfactory and logical to end this volume with the death of Constantine, the first Christian emperor.

We have taken as our title for this volume ‘The Crisis of Empire’, reflecting the incontrovertible fact that the period from Septimius Severus to Constantine was marked by serious dislocation, disturbance and threat to the fabric of the Roman empire. There is, likewise, no doubt that the latter part of the period, between 284 and 337, saw fundamental and far-reaching changes in the nature of imperial power and the organization of the empire which gave to both a form and a substance significantly different from their antecedents in the periods covered by Volumes X and XI. Whether ‘recovery’ is the appropriate word to describe these phenomena is, we think, less obvious, but we are conscious that all such choices, whether traditional or innovative, are judgemental. The period has traditionally been subjected to a tidy periodization, which cannot be wholly avoided. We begin with the accession of Septimius Severus in the civil war following the assassination of Commodus, and the foundation of a dynasty which Rostovtzeff, following in Gibbon’s footsteps, famously characterized as ‘the military monarchy’. This was followed by a half-century of ‘anarchy’ (A.D. 235–84), which saw a series of short reigns of short-lived emperors (not a few of which were simultaneous), before Diocletian seized power and established a collegial rule, first with Maximian, later with two junior ‘Caesars’, thus substantially changing the configuration of imperial power. This period, the first tetrarchy (A.D. 284–305), also saw the first stages in the formalization of the division of the Roman world which shaped the history of the western and eastern empires until the rise of the successor kingdoms and the Arab invasions. After two decades of further conflict between the leading contenders for empire, Constantine defeated Licinius in A.D. 324 and established a sole rule which he and the successors of his line sustained for a further three and a half decades.

Nevertheless, as is noted in the Preface to Volume XIII, there have been significant changes of emphasis and of viewpoint in approaches to the history of the empire in the third and fourth centuries. The editors of Volume XIII rightly draw attention to the fundamentally important works of A. H. M. Jones and of Peter Brown, the one establishing a new foundation for the study of the organization and administration of the later empire, the other stimulating a new appreciation of the interaction of pagan culture and Christianity in the formation of what we now conventionally refer to as ‘late antiquity’. Both of these great works rest on a wealth of modern scholarship on all aspects of Roman imperial civilization which has, by and large, suggested a more gradualist and developmental picture than that of an empire reduced by the 270s to political and military impotence and socio-economic chaos, and rising phoenix-like from the ashes in the hands of Diocletian, his colleagues and his successors.

The editors of the first edition noted that source-criticism had played a central role in revising historical views of the period. In amplification of this, the volume contained a note on the sources by Harold Mattingly, concentrating on the literary and numismatic evidence. In 2002, we would prefer to avoid the term ‘source-criticism’, as suggesting a rather too restricted approach to the appreciation of the importance of the many writers whose works are relevant and we would emphasize the fact that our views of many important historical phenomena have been significantly changed by the accretion of new documentary and other non-literary sources. We have not attempted to write a note to match that of Mattingly, but encouraged the authors of individual chapters to comment on the relevant sources as they think appropriate. The latter half of the twentieth century has seen a plethora of works treating the writers of history in their contemporary context and establishing the value, not merely of the facts which they retail, but of their own experiences and viewpoints. Thus, to name only a few, Cassius Dio and Herodian have been historiographically contextualized, and Tertullian and Cyprian of Carthage made to contribute to more than a merely narrow ‘Christian’ approach to third-century history. The importance of Lactantius and Eusebius (the former in particular long stigmatized as an unreliable source) for the Diocletianic and Constantinian periods has been firmly established. Two works or collections on which Mattingly commented only briefly deserve special notice here. The first is the notorious collection of imperial biographies known as the Historia Augusta, ostensibly the work of six different writers. Mattingly was well aware of the problems which this posed but it has taken the influential work of Sir Ronald Syme, following the pioneering study by Dessau published in 1889, to establish beyond all doubt that this is the work of a single, puzzling and unreliable late fourth-century author whose testimony, especially for the third-century emperors, cannot be used unless supported by evidence from other more reliable sources. Second, the collection of twelve Latin Panegyrics, eight of which are relevant to the Diocletianic and Constantinian periods. These are (of course) rhetorical, tendentious and often chronologically imprecise or confusing but there is nevertheless a great deal of historically valuable information to be derived from them, especially when collated with the other literary and documentary sources, as a recent re-edition and exhaustive commentary demonstrates.

The contributions of numismatics, epigraphy, papyrology and especially archaeology to the history of this period are vital, particularly in the absence of a single reliable and comprehensive literary historian such as Tacitus or Ammiarius Marcellinus. Each category of evidence presents its own difficulties. The complex history of the coinage in the third and fourth centuries is still imperfectly understood in relation to economic history and in particular the relationship between currency debasement and price-inflation. There are a few very important new inscriptions such as the Currency Edict of Diocletian, but the number and density of inscriptions pales in comparison with the second century. Papyri of the third and fourth centuries are particularly plentiful and attest to important features of political, social and economic history, not least in elucidating some of the complex chronological problems of imperial reigns and providing detailed evidence for the Decian persecution. Some individual texts or groups of texts have, however, occasionally been made to sustain too heavy a burden of generalization: the collapse of the coinage in the 260s, the growth of the annona militaris, the crushing burdens of liturgical service and the decline of the curiales. Nevertheless, the papyri have an important contribution to make and add a dynamic perspective to the important evidence of the legal codes which can, if taken in isolation, present a rather static picture. Archaeology too makes an important and positive contribution in allowing us to see regional and local variations in the degree of social and economic change and the richness and variety of the material culture.

The contents of this volume are divided into six main sections. The intention of Part I is to provide a basic narrative account of the political history of the period between 193 and 337, devoting separate chapters to the Severan dynasty, the period of the so-called ‘anarchy’ (235–84), the first tetrarchy (284–305), and finally the succession and the reign of Constantine (306–37). Part II offers an account of the administration of the empire from what is, broadly speaking, the perspective of the central authority. One chapter is devoted to the army, which underwent major changes in the late third and early fourth centuries, another to the central public administration. The third chapter in this section deals with the development of Roman law, for which the Severan and the Diocletianic periods were particularly significant. The placing of this topic in this section is a deliberate tactic, intended to indicate that these are not merely matters of legal theory or jurisprudence, but that the legal developments and their perpetrators were central to the changes in government and administration. As in the case of the chapters on Egypt and on Christianity (see below), the account offered here contains important material on the period before the accession of Septimius Severus, not treated in detail in Volume XI.

Part III corresponds in a broad way to the province-by-province treatments offered in the new editions of Volumes X and XI but includes only one chapter on an individual province (Egypt). We have adopted a different, thematic plan for this volume, dealing separately with the development of the provinces, regions and frontiers and with the provincial and local administration (as distinct from the central administrative structures described in Part II). The single provincial chapter in this section may seem anomalous, but perhaps not less so than the corresponding anomaly in the first edition (on Britain). There are two reasons for including a detailed treatment of Egypt. One is that the evidence of the papyri for the third century and in particular for the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine makes a very important contribution to our understanding of the changes in administration and the socio-economic problems of the period, and it is a contribution which goes far beyond the borders of the province of Egypt itself, touching on major features of the central administration. The second is that Egypt was deliberately excluded from the provincial section in Volume XI, the intention being that the chapters in Volumes X and XII should between them cover the whole period.

Part IV consists of two chapters written by a single author, offering an account of the very complex problems presented by the monetary and economic history of the period – more vital and more difficult to interpret for the third century than for any other part of the empire’s history.

In Part v we offer a survey of the most important of Rome’s neighbours, beyond the boundaries of the empire, the Germans, the Sassanids, the inhabitants of Armenia and the Arabs and desert peoples. These are of particular importance not merely because of the successive periods of military crisis provoked by the hostility of external tribes and kingdoms during the third century, but also because an appreciation of their role and development is crucial to our understanding of the conditions which determined the shape of the eastern and western empires in later centuries.

Part vi is devoted, broadly speaking to religion and culture, though it will be noted that we have departed from the precedent of the first edition in not dealing with the history of Greek and Latin literature in this period. But the centrality of the topic of Christianization needs no justification and religious change may be said to be the predominant theme in four of the five chapters in this section. Two chapters deal with pagan religion and popular culture, one with the development of the philosophical schools and one with Christianity as such. The editors took the decision to consolidate the treatment of the subject between A.D. 70 and 337 in this volume rather than split it between Volumes XI and XII. To this has been added a chapter on the important topic of art and architecture in the later empire.

As in earlier volumes, authors have been encouraged to provide what they saw as a balanced account of their topic in the current state of knowledge and research. The editors have not attempted to impose any kind of unity of view or approach on the individual chapters and they are conscious of the fact that it is more than normally difficult to reach a generally accepted ‘standard’ account of much of this period, particularly the central decades of the third century. For this reason, the reader may well find that there is a greater than usual number of inconsistencies or differences of view between one chapter and another. We take the view that this unavoidable and we have not attempted even the minimum amount of reconciliation which was applied in earlier volumes.

We are conscious of the fact that there have been unavoidable delays in seeing this volume through to completion. Volumes X, XI and XII of the new edition were planned in conjunction and it was hoped they could proceed pari passu over a period of a few years. That, alas, proved far too optimistic. In the event, this is the last of the volumes of the new edition to see the light of day, coming behind Volumes XIII and XIV. Many of the chapters were written several years ago, and we have been able only to offer their authors the opportunity to make minor revisions and to update their bibliographies.

The principle of ordering the bibliographies is that adopted for the later volumes in the new edition. A list of frequently cited works of general importance has been extracted and placed at the beginning. There then follow bibliographies for each part.

The editors have incurred many debts in the preparation of this volume. John Matthews was one of the original team who planned the work. We are of course, enormously grateful to all the individual authors. The maps were compiled by John Wilkes. Chapters 11 and 12 were translated by Michel Cottier and Ann Johnston. Chapters 6a–d were translated by Hugh Ward-Perkins. Chapters 9 and 16 were translated by Brian Pearce and Geoffrey Greatrex. In the latter stages of the work, Simon Corcoran has provided a great deal of assistance to the editors, particularly on the bibliographies but also on substantive matters, especially in the chapters covering the period from 284–337. We are very grateful indeed to him for this work, without which the volume would have been further delayed. Thanks are also due to Professor R. J. W. Evans and Mr. Fatih Onur for advice on the accentuation of modern toponyms in Appendix III.

The index was compiled by Barbara Hird.

Finally, it is difficult to pay adequate tribute to Pauline Hire, whose vision and determination has driven this new edition to completion. It is unfortunate that we were not able to complete it before her retirement but we hope that she will greet the appearance of this volume with pleasure and relief. The work which remained to be done after Pauline’s retirement was not inconsiderable and we are equally indebted to her successor, Dr Michael Sharp, for his cheerful patience, goodwill and determination.

A. K. B.
A. M. C.
P. D. A. G.