

CONTENTS

Preface	page xv
Acknowledgments	xix
1 The scope of linguistic anthropology	1
1.1 Definitions	2
1.2 The study of linguistic practices	5
1.3 Linguistic anthropology and other disciplines in the humanities and social sciences	10
1.3.1 Linguistic anthropology and sociolinguistics	13
1.4 Theoretical concerns in contemporary linguistic anthropology	14
1.4.1 Performance	14
1.4.2 Indexicality	17
1.4.3 Participation	20
1.5 Conclusions	21
2 Theories of culture	23
2.1 Culture as distinct from nature	24
2.2 Culture as knowledge	27
2.2.1 Culture as socially distributed knowledge	30
2.3 Culture as communication	33
2.3.1 Lévi-Strauss and the semiotic approach	33
2.3.2 Clifford Geertz and the interpretive approach	36
2.3.3 The indexicality approach and metapragmatics	37
2.3.4 Metaphors as folk theories of the world	38
2.4 Culture as a system of mediation	39
2.5 Culture as a system of practices	43
2.6 Culture as a system of participation	46
2.7 Predicting and interpreting	47
2.8 Conclusions	49

Contents

3 Linguistic diversity	51
3.1 Language in culture: the Boasian tradition	52
3.1.1 Franz Boas and the use of native languages	52
3.1.2 Sapir and the search for languages' internal logic	56
3.1.3 Benjamin Lee Whorf, worldviews, and cryptotypes	57
3.2 Linguistic relativity	60
3.2.1 Language as objectification of the world: from von Humboldt to Cassirer	62
3.2.2 Language as a guide to the world: metaphors	64
3.2.3 Color terms and linguistic relativity	65
3.2.4 Language and science	67
3.3 Language, languages, and linguistic varieties	69
3.4 Linguistic repertoire	71
3.5 Speech communities, heteroglossia, and language ideologies	72
3.5.1 Speech community: from idealization to heteroglossia	72
3.5.2 Multilingual speech communities	76
3.5.3 Definitions of speech community	79
3.6 Conclusions	83
4 Ethnographic methods	84
4.1 Ethnography	84
4.1.1 What is an ethnography?	85
4.1.1.1 Studying people in communities	88
4.1.2 Ethnographers as cultural mediators	91
4.1.3 How comprehensive should an ethnography be?
Complementarity and collaboration in ethnographic research	95
4.2 Two kinds of field linguistics	98
4.3 Participant-observation	99
4.4 Interviews	102
4.4.1 The cultural ecology of interviews	103
4.4.2 Different kinds of interviews	106
4.5 Identifying and using the local language(s)	110
4.6 Writing interaction	113
4.6.1 Taking notes while recording	115
4.7 Electronic recording	116
4.7.1 Does the presence of the camera affect the interaction?	117
4.8 Goals and ethics of fieldwork	119
4.9 Conclusions	121
5 Transcription: from writing to digitized images	122
5.1 Writing	123

	Contents
5.2 The word as a unit of analysis	126
5.2.1 The word as a unit of analysis in anthropological research	129
5.2.2 The word in historical linguistics	130
5.3 Beyond words	132
5.4 Standards of acceptability	134
5.5 Transcription formats and conventions	137
5.6 Visual representations other than writing	144
5.6.1 Representations of gestures	145
5.6.2 Representations of spatial organization and participants' visual access	150
5.6.3 Integrating texts, drawings, and images	151
5.7 Translation	154
5.8 Non-native speakers as researchers	160
5.9 Summary	161
6 Meaning in linguistic forms	162
6.1 The formal method in linguistic analysis	162
6.2 Meaning as relations among signs	164
6.3 Some basic properties of linguistic sounds	166
6.3.1 The phoneme	168
6.3.2 Etic and emic in anthropology	172
6.4 Relationships of contiguity: from phonemes to morphemes	174
6.5 From morphology to the framing of events	178
6.5.1 Deep cases and hierarchies of features	181
6.5.2 Framing events through verbal morphology	188
6.5.3 The topicality hierarchy	191
6.5.4 Sentence types and the preferred argument structure	192
6.5.5 Transitivity in grammar and discourse	193
6.6 The acquisition of grammar in language socialization studies	197
6.7 Metalinguistic awareness: from denotational meaning to pragmatics	199
6.7.1 The pragmatic meaning of pronouns	202
6.8 From symbols to indexes	204
6.8.1 Iconicity in languages	205
6.8.2 Indexes, shifters, and deictic terms	207
6.8.2.1 Indexical meaning and the linguistic construction of gender	209
6.8.2.2 Contextualization cues	211
6.9 Conclusions	213
7 Speaking as social action	214
7.1 Malinowski: language as action	215

Contents

7.2 Philosophical approaches to language as action	218
7.2.1 From Austin to Searle: speech acts as units of analysis	219
7.2.1.1 Indirect speech acts	226
7.3 Speech act theory and linguistic anthropology	227
7.3.1 Truth	229
7.3.2 Intentions	231
7.3.3 Local theory of person	233
7.4 Language games as units of analysis	236
7.5 Conclusions	243
8 Conversational exchanges	245
8.1 The sequential nature of conversational units	247
8.1.1 Adjacency pairs	250
8.2 The notion of preference	259
8.2.1 Repairs and corrections	261
8.2.2 The avoidance of psychological explanation	263
8.3 Conversation analysis and the “context” issue	264
8.3.1 The autonomous claim	267
8.3.2 The issue of relevance	271
8.4 The meaning of talk	275
8.5 Conclusions	277
9 Units of participation	280
9.1 The notion of activity in Vygotskian psychology	281
9.2 Speech events: from functions of speech to social units	284
9.2.1 Ethnographic studies of speech events	290
9.3 Participation	294
9.3.1 Participant structure	294
9.3.2 Participation frameworks	295
9.3.3 Participant frameworks	307
9.4 Authorship, intentionality, and the joint construction of interpretation	314
9.5 Participation in time and space: human bodies in the built environment	321
9.6 Conclusions	328
10 Conclusions	331
10.1 Language as the human condition	331
10.2 To have a language	332
10.3 Public and private language	334
10.4 Language in culture	336

	Contents
10.5 Language in society	337
10.6 What kind of language?	338
Appendix: Practical tips on recording interaction	340
References	348
Name index	387
Subject index	393