The Formation of Islam

Religion and Society in the Near East, 600–1800

Jonathan Berkey’s book surveys the religious history of the peoples of the Near East from roughly 600 to 1800 CE. The opening chapter examines the religious scene in the Near East in late antiquity, and the religious traditions which preceded Islam. Subsequent chapters investigate Islam’s first century and the beginnings of its own traditions, the ‘classical’ period from the accession of the ‘Abbasids to the rise of the Buyid amirs, and thereafter the emergence of new forms of Islam in the middle period. Throughout, close attention is paid to the experiences of Jews and Christians, as well as Muslims. The book stresses that Islam did not appear all at once, but emerged slowly, as part of a prolonged process whereby it was differentiated from other religious traditions and, indeed, that much that we take as characteristic of Islam is in fact the product of the medieval period. This book has been written for students and for all those with an interest in the emergence and evolution of Islam.

Jonathan P. Berkey is Associate Professor of History at Davidson College. His publications include Popular Preaching and Religious Authority in the Medieval Islamic Near East (2001).
THEMES IN ISLAMIC HISTORY comprises a range of titles exploring different aspects of Islamic history, society and culture by leading scholars in the field. Books are thematic in approach, offering a comprehensive and accessible overview of the subject. Generally, surveys treat Islamic history from its origins to the demise of the Ottoman empire, although some offer a more developed analysis of a particular period, or project into the present, depending on the subject-matter. All the books are written to interpret and illuminate the past, as gateways to a deeper understanding of Islamic civilization and its peoples.

Editorial adviser: Patricia Crone, Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton

Already published:
Chase F. Robinson Islamic Historiography 0 521 62081 3 hardback 0 521 62936 5 paperback
To Vivien
The Formation of Islam
Religion and Society in the Near East, 600–1800

JONATHAN P. BERKEY
Davidson College
Contents

Preface
page ix

Glossary
page xi

Maps
page xvi

Part I  The Near East before Islam
1 Introduction
2 The religions of late antiquity 3 Arabia before Islam 4 The early seventh century

Part II  The Emergence of Islam, 600–750
5 Approaches and problems 6 The origins of the Muslim community 7 Early Islam in the Near East 8 The Umayyad period 9 The beginnings of sectarianism 10 The non-Muslims of early Islam 11 The ‘Abbasid revolution

Part III  The Consolidation of Islam, 750–1000 12 Issues of Islamic identity 13 Religion and politics 14 Shi‘ism
15 The formation of Sunni traditionalism 16 Asceticism and mysticism 17 The non-Muslim communities

Part IV  Medieval Islam, 1000–1500 18 The medieval Islamic Near East 19 Characteristics of the medieval Islamic world 20 A Sunni “revival”?
21 Common patterns in social and political organization

© in this web service Cambridge University Press www.cambridge.org
Contents

<table> <thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter</th> <th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr> </thead> <tbody>
<tr>
<td>22</td>
<td>Modes of justice</td>
<td>216</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>The transmission of religious knowledge</td> <td>224</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24</td>
<td>Sufism</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>Popular religion</td>
<td>248</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Epilogue</td>
<td>259</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>From medieval to modern Islam</td>
<td>261</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>

Suggested reading

Index

270

276
Preface

This book constitutes an attempt to describe and understand the slow emergence of a distinctively Islamic tradition over the centuries which followed the death of that tradition’s founder, Muhammad ibn ‘Abdallah, in 632 CE. It is not a narrative history, although its analytical approach is (I hope) historical. I have cast the central questions as those of religious identity and authority. The question of what it means to be a Muslim requires, I believe, a dynamic answer. Had the question been posed to Muhammad, his answer (if indeed he would have understood the question) would have been quite different than that of a jurist in Baghdad in the ninth century, or of a Sufi mystic in Cairo in the fifteenth. From a historical perspective, no answer is better than any other, and none has any value except against the background of the larger historical factors that produced it. In the multicultural Near East, those factors have always included faith traditions other than Islam, and so I have tried throughout to give some account of the complex ties which, from the very first, have bound Muslim identities to those of Jews, Christians, and others.

The target audience for this book is quite broad, and therefore the target is, paradoxically, perhaps more difficult to strike squarely than with, say, a scholarly monograph of the usual sort, or a conventional introduction to “Islam”. It is hoped that the book will serve students, both graduates and undergraduates, and also an interested lay public, as an introduction to the historical origins and development of the Islamic tradition. At the same time, I have tried to write it in such a way that specialists may also find it of use. I have, therefore, made decisions regarding editorial matters such as transliteration and footnoting with an eye on the whole target rather than any one portion of it. I have not shied away from using foreign (mostly Arabic) terms; on the other hand, those terms are transliterated in a simplified fashion, omitting most of the diacritical marks that are standard in scholarly writing, and a glossary is provided for the convenience of non-Arabic speakers. For non-specialists, this may remove a source of visual distraction and confusion; specialists, by contrast, should have no difficulty recognizing the indicated Arabic terms. The footnotes I have used for disparate purposes: both to indicate the particular sources from which I have taken information or ideas, and also to suggest to the interested reader places where she or he might be able to pick up and pursue further the thread of an argument touched on necessarily briefly here. The scope of this book’s topic is enormous, and so it has been impractical to cite every relevant work; the notes should be viewed as a launching pad for further investigation. With (again) an eye on the audience, I have in citations privileged secondary literature over primary sources, and tried to cite material in English wherever possible. For the sake of simplicity and familiarity, I have throughout the book given dates according to the Western rather than the Islamic calendar.

Finally I come to the matter of thanks. Over the course, not simply of writing this book, but of two decades of thinking seriously about the Islamic world, I have incurred a variety of purely scholarly debts, to individuals I have known and with whom I have studied, and to others whom I have never met. Some of those will be apparent from the notes – the curious will easily discern there the names of those scholars whose writings on various topics of Islamic history have most significantly influenced my own. More immediately, I have the privilege of thanking those who contributed directly and (not always) knowingly to the writing of this book, by reading portions of it, answering queries, offering suggestions, passing on publications of their own. They include Robert Berkey, Sonja Brentjes, David Frankfurter, Matthew Gordon, Oleg Grabar, Emil Homerin, Lawrence Fine, Keith Lewinstein, Christopher Melchert, Megan Reid, Daniella Talmon-Heller, Christopher Taylor, and Cynthia Villagomez. Joe Gutekanst, of the Interlibrary Loan department at the Davidson College library, was as central a figure in the writing of this book as Ibn ‘Abbas was to the transmission of prophetic traditions – the cognoscenti will be able to appreciate fully my debt to him. I don’t know whether it is a good thing to say of editors that they are patient, but Marigold Acland of the Cambridge University Press has been not only patient but helpful and encouraging, which is far more important. A number of people read and commented upon the entire manuscript, including my Davidson colleagues Robert Williams and Scott Denham, and also a perceptive anonymous reader for the Cambridge University Press. Patricia Crone began her association with this manuscript as an anonymous reader, but eventually I learned her name, and from her I have learned more about Islamic history than an Associate Professor would normally care to admit. Paul Cobb owed me nothing beyond a friendship cultivated on long car rides over to a seminar in Chapel Hill, but repaid that meager debt generously with his time, constructive comments, and unfailing enthusiasm.

To my family, whose patience and understanding and support have been essential during the five years in which I have been actively working on this project, I will simply paraphrase the old spiritual: “Done at last! Done at last! Thank God Almighty, I’m done at last!”
This glossary is provided for the convenience of readers unfamiliar with Arabic. Many of these terms or phrases have complex or multiple meanings; those stressed here correspond to the sense in which they are used in this book. Fuller definitions of most of these terms can be found in the Encyclopaedia of Islam, second edition (El²).

ahbar: a Koranic term used in conjunction with rabbaniyun, indicating Jewish religious authorities (i.e., rabbis) ahl al-bayt: literally, “the people of the house,” i.e., the family of the Prophet ahl al-dhimma: see dhimmi ‘alim: scholar, the singular of ‘*ulama’ amir: literally, “commander”; a title commonly used among the military rulers of the Middle Period ashab al-hadith: the partisans of hadith, i.e., those who stressed hadith as a source of juristic authority ashab al-ra‘y: those who championed the use of human reason in fashioning the law ashraf: see sharif atabeg: a military tutor or guardian, a title common among the military regimes of the Middle Period baba: a Turkish and Persian honorific meaning father, and sometimes used to refer to respected Sufi dervishes bakka‘un: literally, “those who weep,” used especially for a group of early Muslim ascetics and penitents baraka: blessing, and more particularly a spiritual power commonly associated with certain pious individuals or activities bid‘a: innovation, the opposite of sunna da‘wa: a call or summoning, used to refer to the missionary activity of various religio-political movements dawla: literally, a “turning,” including a turn or change of rulers, which by extension came to refer to a dynasty such as the ‘Abbasids xii Glossary

dhikr: remembrance, as in the act of remembering the name of God, used to refer to one of the most common Sufi activities dhimmi: one of the ahl al-dhimma, the “people of the covenant of protection,” i.e., non-Muslims living under the protection of Muslim regimes diwani: a list or register, as of names; specifically, a list of those in the early Islamic polity entitled to a share of the wealth taken as booty during the early conquests fana’: annihilation, a term used by the Sufis to describe their ecstatic spiritual state faqih (pl. fuqaha‘): a jurist, a scholar of the law faqir (pl. fuqara‘): poor, a term used to identify a Sufi fard ‘ayn: a legal obligation incumbent on individual Muslims fard kifaya: a legal obligation incumbent on the community of Muslims as a whole fatwa: a legal opinion issued by a competent jurist fiqh: the science of Islamic jurisprudence fitna: literally, a “temptation,” used to refer to a series of civil wars which threatened the unity of the Islamic polity in its early years futuwwa: literally, “the qualities of young men,” used to refer to a variety of mostly urban fraternal organizations ghazi: a holy warrior ghazw: a military expedition or raid ghulat: literally, “extremists,” used especially of those Shi‘is accused of espousing heretical doctrines hadith: reports about the words of deeds of Muhammad and his companions hajj: the Muslim pilgrimage to holy sites in and around Mecca hakam: an arbiter of disputes in pre-Islamic Arabia halqa (pl. halaq): literally, a “circle,” as in a teaching circle, consisting of a teacher and his students hanif (pl. hunafa‘): one who follows the true monotheistic religion, sometimes used to refer to pre-Islamic Arabian monotheists hanifiyya: the religion of the hunafa‘ hijra: the “flight” of Muhammad and his companions from Mecca to Yathrib/Medina, which event marks the founding of the first Muslim community and the start of the Muslim calendar hisba: either (1) the Koranic injunction to “order what is good and forbid what is wrong,” or (2) the office of the muhtasib hiyal: “tricks” developed by the jurists to circumvent some of the more restrictive doctrines of Islamic law, especially in the area of commercial practice hujja: literally “proof,” used by Isma‘iliils to refer to an authoritative figure in the religious hierarchy ijaza: the authorization issued by an author or scholar to a pupil allowing the pupil to transmit a text on his authority ijma‘: the consensus of the community, or of the scholars of the law, one of the principal foundations or sources of Islamic law
Glossary

ijtihad: literally “exertion,” used by the jurists to refer to the process of determining valid legal judgments from the various sources of the law, and thus the opposite of taqlid ‘ilm: knowledge, and especially religious knowledge, that is, the content of the religious sciences imam: a prayer leader; but also a term for the leader of the community, used especially by the Shi‘is to refer to those members of the Prophet’s family whom they recognize as their rightful leader isnad: a chains of authorities, linking a student through his teacher and his teacher’s teachers back to the author or source of a text (especially a hadith) isra‘iliyyat: stories and traditions concerning Biblical figures who are mentioned in the Koran which supplemented and contextualized the sparse Koranic narratives, but which many ulama later looked upon with suspicion ittihad: a complex theological term which some Sufis used to indicate spiritual “union” with God jahiliyya: the “time of ignorance” before the coming of Islam jama‘a: “group,” that is, the collectivity of Muslims jihad: struggle, that is, in the path of God, including a particular form of that struggle, “holy war” jinn: a category of daemonic beings or spirits, mentioned by the Koran jizya: a head tax or poll tax, to which non-Muslims living under Muslim rule are normally subject

Ka‘ba: the pre-Islamic shrine at Mecca, which Muslim tradition associates with Abraham khalifa: the caliph, or leader of the Sunni Muslim community; more precisely, the khalifat rasul allah, or “deputy of the prophet of God” or in more controversial language, as the holder of the office has been called at certain times, the khalifat allah, the “deputy of God” khanqah: a Sufi convent or monastery khariji: literally, “one who goes out”; the term refers to a member of the earliest major Islamic sectarian group khirqa: the patched and tattered cloak symbolizing the Sufi mystic’s poverty khushdashiyya: the special bond of loyalty among the Mamluk soldiers and their patrons khuṭba: a formal sermon delivered to Muslim congregations at noon on Fridays ma‘rifa: knowledge, and specifically the intuitive knowledge of mystical insight, and distinct therefore from ‘ilm madhhab (pl. madhahib): literally, “way,” that is, one of the recognized Sunni schools of law madrasa: a college or school in which Islamic law was the principal subject of instruction mahdi: literally “one who is rightly-guided [by God],” the term came to have messianic overtones and referred to the awaited savior who would restore justice and return the community to the proper path mamluk: a slave, more particularly a slave trained to serve as a soldier mawla (pl. mawali): a term of complex meaning, it is used here primarily to indicate a “client,” a dependent legal status required of early non-Arab converts mawlid: birthday, especially that of the Prophet mihna: a “testing,” and more specifically that instituted by the caliph al-Ma’mun ostensibly to enforce the view that the Koran was created millet: the Turkish form of the Arabic mil‘a, meaning “religion” and by extension a religious community; by the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries it was used specifically for the political structure of the non-Muslim communities in the Ottoman Empire mishna: the collection of Jewish oral laws and tradition, given final form in the early third century CE mudarris: teacher, especially a teacher of law or one of its ancillary subjects in a madrasa mufti: a jurist qualified to issue a legal opinion (fatwa) muhaddith: a transmitter of hadith muhtasib: an officer implementing the hisba, especially in the urban markets, hence a “market inspector” mujahid: one who wages jihad mukhtasar: an abridged legal handbook mulk: royal power or authority, used sometimes to refer to a pre- or un-Islamic notion of political power distinct from that of a proper khalifa nass: designation, specifically, the action by which one (Shi‘i) designated his successor pir: a Persian term corresponding to the Arabic shaykh, meaning literally “old man,” and used especially by Sufis to indicate a recognized spiritual guide qadi: a judge of an Islamic law court qa‘im: “one who rises,” that is, against an illegitimate regime, a popular term among Shi‘is to refer to the messianic restorer of God’s justice qibla: the direction a Muslim faces when praying rabb: literally, “lord,” a common Koranic term for God rabbanīyun: see ahbar rajud: “one who rejects,” used to refer to those who rejected the authority of the first three caliphs; hence a Shi‘i, a partisan of ‘Ali raj‘a: literally, “return,” as in the return (to life) of a hero or other figure who has disappeared (or died) ribat: a term used to refer both to a frontier fortress, and later to one type of Sufi hospice ridda: literally, “return,” and by extension, “apostasy,” referring especially to the efforts of Arab converts to Islam who sought to renounce their allegiance after Muhammad’s death Glossary xv

sama’: literally “hearing,” and by extension the hearing of music, or spiritual concert of the Sufis sha’ā: intercession, especially with God shahid: a martyr sharaf: nobility, the quality of a sharif sharif (pl. ashraf): a “noble” person; in the Islamic context, those who claimed membership or descent in the family of Muhammad shaykh: literally, “old man,” a term used to refer to a Sufi master, a teacher, or any other figure of religious authority shī‘a: the “party” of ‘Ali, that is, the Shi‘is who believed that leadership of the community should have passed from Muhammad to ‘Ali and thence to his descendants silṣila: a Sufi shaykh’s chain of spiritual authority, or spiritual genealogy sīra: a biographical account of the Prophet’s life softa: lower-ranking students in the madrasas of Ottoman Istanbul suhba: “companionship” or “discipleship,” a term used to describe the relationship between a teacher and his closest pupils sultan: one who wields (political) authority, and a common term for a Muslim ruler in the Middle Period summa: the normative practice of the Prophet and his companions, as known through hadith sunni: a Muslim who accepts the legitimacy and authority of the historical caliphate sura: a chapter of the Koran taqlid: “imitation,” and more specifically in the legal sphere, being bound by a previous juristic consensus on a particular point of law tariqa (pl. turuq): a recognized Sufi “way” or “path” of spiritual discipline, and by extension the various orders of mystics tassawwuf: Sufism ‘ulama’: those who know, i.e., the scholars of the Islamic religious sciences umma: the community of Muslims ‘urf: custom usul: the “principles” or “foundations,” especially of Islamic jurisprudence wali (pl. awliya’): one who is “close” to God, i.e., a saint or “friend” of God waqf (pl. awqaf): a charitable endowment established according to Islamic law, for the benefit of a family, or a religious institution, or for some other pious purpose wilaya: a complex term which can indicate sovereign power or authority (as in that which Shi‘is believe is invested in the Imam), and also (more properly as walaya) the status of sainthood, especially in Sufi discourse zandaqa: heretical unbelief generally, and also more particularly Manichaeism zawiya: a usually small religious institution established by or for the benefit of a Sufi shaykh zuhd: renunciation, i.e., of worldly temptations zindiq: a freethinker or non-believer, or more specifically a Manichaean