Acknowledgements and thanks

This book would not have been possible if it were not for the many people I have met who have hated Business English teaching or who have been afraid of it! I am grateful to all the people – teachers and others – who asked me about Business English teaching, who asked for my advice, or who expressed their exasperation or explained their frustrations. Without an awareness of the negative side of this work, I would never have got to the point where I actually felt it was necessary for me to write this book. My thanks to all those colleagues who badgered me with questions or who were keen to throw around ideas.

Thank you, too, to my old bosses who were wonderful mentors and guides. Thank you for giving me so many invaluable opportunities to teach Business English or ESP, and thank you especially for leaving me the freedom to experiment. Thank you for listening and for giving me encouragement through your feedback or requests for seminars.

In these acknowledgements I must, of course, also mention my students, even though I doubt any of them will ever read these pages. It was these people who inspired all the solutions you will find in this book. If I hadn't enjoyed teaching them, I doubt I would have been able to motivate myself to keep going. So thank you, students, for being such a great source of inspiration and for giving me such satisfying work!

My special thanks are also due to my mother and late father who supported my work throughout the years. They both recognised the value of Business English teaching so gave me a respect for and a belief in my profession. At a time when many old-time EFL teachers are fighting for acceptance of their work as a ‘profession’, I think it is particularly important that there are some of us who feel in our hearts that what we are doing really can be called professional.

An enormous thank you, too, to my personal and business partner at Profile Solutions International, Dr Philip B Nathan. His ongoing practical support, stimulating discussion and good, old-fashioned encouragement are constantly appreciated.

Finally, I would like to thank Penny Ur, my series editor, for her valuable comments and everyone at Cambridge University Press who made this book a reality. I won’t mention any names in particular because I would be missing out the many mysterious backroom people in the team who are involved in making things a success!
