The Theory of Moral Sentiments

or

An Essay towards an Analysis of the Principles by which Men naturally judge concerning the Conduct and Character, first of their Neighbours, and afterwards of themselves
Since the first publication of The Theory of Moral Sentiments, which was so long ago as the beginning of the year 1759, several corrections, and a good many illustrations of the doctrines contained in it, have occurred to me. But the various occupations in which the different accidents of my life necessarily involved me, have till now prevented me from revising this work with the care and attention which I always intended. The reader will find the principal alterations which I have made in this New Edition, in the last Chapter of the third Section of Part First; and in the four first Chapters of Part Third. Part Sixth, as it stands in this New Edition, is altogether new. In Part Seventh, I have brought together the greater part of the different passages concerning the Stoical Philosophy, which, in the former Editions, had been scattered about in different parts of the work. I have likewise endeavoured to explain more fully, and examine more distinctly, some of the doctrines of that famous sect. In the fourth and last Section of the same Part, I have thrown together a few additional observations concerning the duty and principle of veracity. There are, besides, in other parts of the work, a few other alterations and corrections of no great moment.

In the last paragraph of the first Edition of the present work, I said, that I should in another discourse endeavour to give an account of the general principles of law and government, and of the different revolutions which they had undergone in the different ages and periods of society; not only in what concerns justice, but in what concerns police,

---

1 The Advertisement was added in edition 6.
revenue, and arms, and whatever else is the object of law. In the Enquiry concerning the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, I have partly executed this promise; at least so far as concerns police, revenue, and arms. What remains, the theory of jurisprudence, which I have long projected, I have hitherto been hindered from executing, by the same occupations which had till now prevented me from revising the present work. Though my very advanced age leaves me, I acknowledge, very little expectation of ever being able to execute this great work to my own satisfaction; yet, as I have not altogether abandoned the design, and as I wish still to continue under the obligation of doing what I can, I have allowed the paragraph to remain as it was published more than thirty years ago, when I entertained no doubt of being able to execute every thing which it announced.

2 Smith never finished this work but some idea of it may be gained through the students’ notes from his much earlier lectures at Glasgow University, now edited and published in I.J.
Contents

Part I Of the propriety of action 11

Section I Of the sense of propriety 11
  Chapter I Of sympathy 11
  Chapter II Of the pleasure of mutual sympathy 17
  Chapter III Of the manner in which we judge of the propriety or impropriety of the affections of other men, by their concord or dissonance with our own 20

Chapter IV The same subject continued 23

Chapter V Of the amiable and respectable virtues 29

Section II Of the degrees of the different passions which are consistent with propriety 32
  Introduction 32
  Chapter I Of the passions which take their origin from the body 33
  Chapter II Of those passions which take their origin from a particular turn or habit of the imagination 38
  Chapter III Of the unsocial passions 41
  Chapter IV Of the social passions 47
  Chapter V Of the selfish passions 49

Section III Of the effects of prosperity and adversity upon the judgment of mankind with regard to the propriety of action; and why it is more easy to obtain their approbation in the one state than in the other 53
Contents

Chapter I  That though our sympathy with sorrow is generally a more lively sensation than our sympathy with joy, it commonly falls much more short of the violence of what is naturally felt by the person principally concerned 53
Chapter II  Of the origin of ambition, and of the distinction of ranks 60
Chapter III  Of the corruption of our moral sentiments, which is occasioned by this disposition to admire the rich and the great, and to despise or neglect persons of poor and mean condition 72

Part II  Of merit and demerit; or, of the objects of reward and punishment

78
Section I  Of the sense of merit and demerit 78
Introduction
78
Chapter I  That whatever appears to be the proper object of gratitude, appears to deserve reward; and that, in the same manner, whatever appears to be the proper object of resentment, appears to deserve punishment 79
Chapter II  Of the proper objects of gratitude and resentment 81
Chapter III  That where there is no approbation of the conduct of the person who confers the benefit, there is little sympathy with the gratitude of him who receives it: and that, on the contrary, where there is no disapprobation of the motives of the person who does the mischief, there is no sort of sympathy with the resentment of him who suffers it 83
Chapter IV  Recapitulation of the foregoing chapters 85
Chapter V  The analysis of the sense of merit and demerit 86

Section II  Of justice and beneficence

91
Chapter I  Comparison of those two virtues 91
Chapter II  Of the sense of justice, of remorse, and of the consciousness of merit 96
Chapter III  Of the utility of this constitution of nature 100
Contents

Section III Of the influence of fortune upon the sentiments of mankind, with regard to the merit or demerit of actions 108
Introduction 108
Chapter I Of the causes of this influence of fortune 110
Chapter II Of the extent of this influence of fortune 114
Chapter III Of the final cause of this irregularity of sentiments 123

Part III Of the foundation of our judgments concerning our own sentiments and conduct, and of the sense of duty 128
Chapter I Of the principle of self-approbation and of self-disapprobation 128
Chapter II Of the love of praise, and of that of praise-worthiness; and of the dread of blame, and of that of blame-worthiness 132
Chapter III Of the influence and authority of conscience 155
Chapter IV Of the nature of self-deceit, and of the origin and use of general rules 182
Chapter V Of the influence and authority of the general rules of morality, and that they are justly regarded as the laws of the Deity 188
Chapter VI In what cases the sense of duty ought to be the sole principle of our conduct, and in what cases it ought to concur with other motives 199

Part IV Of the effect of utility upon the sentiment of approbation 209
Chapter I Of the beauty which the appearance of utility bestows upon all the productions of art, and of the extensive influence of this species of beauty 209
Chapter II Of the beauty which the appearance of utility bestows upon the characters and actions of men; and how far the perception of this beauty may be regarded as one of the original principles of approbation 218
Contents

Part V Of the influence of custom and fashion upon the sentiments of moral approbation and disapprobation 227
  - Chapter I Of the influence of custom and fashion upon our notions of beauty and deformity 227
  - Chapter II Of the influence of custom and fashion upon moral sentiments 234

Part VI Of the character of virtue 248
  - Introduction 248
  - Section I Of the character of the individual, so far as it affects his own happiness; or of prudence 248
  - Section II Of the character of the individual, so far as it can affect the happiness of other people 255
    - Introduction 255
    - Chapter I Of the order in which individuals are recommended by nature to our care and attention 256
    - Chapter II Of the order in which societies are by nature recommended to our beneficence 267
    - Chapter III Of universal benevolence 276
  - Section III Of self-command 279
    - Conclusion of the Sixth Part 309

Part VII Of systems of moral philosophy 313
  - Section I Of the questions which ought to be examined in a theory of moral sentiments 313
  - Section II Of the different accounts which have been given of the nature of virtue 314
    - Introduction 314
    - Chapter I Of those systems which make virtue consist in propriety 315
    - Chapter II Of those systems which make virtue consist in prudence 347
    - Chapter III Of those systems which make virtue consist in benevolence 354
    - Chapter IV Of licentious systems 361
Part I
Of the propriety of action
Consisting of three sections

Section I Of the sense of propriety

Chapter I Of sympathy

1 How selfish soever man may be supposed, there are evidently some principles in his nature, which interest him in the fortune of others, and render their happiness necessary to him, though he derives nothing from it except the pleasure of seeing it. Of this kind is pity or compassion, the emotion which we feel for the misery of others, when we either see it, or are made to conceive it in a very lively manner. That we often derive sorrow from the sorrow of others, is a matter of fact too obvious to require any instances to prove it; for this sentiment, like all the other original passions of human nature, is by no means confined to the virtuous and humane, though they perhaps may feel it with the most exquisite sensibility. The greatest ruffian, the most hardened violator of the laws of society, is not altogether without it.

2 As we have no immediate experience of what other men feel, we can form no idea of the manner in which they are affected, but by conceiving what we ourselves should feel in the like situation. Though our brother is upon the rack, as long as we ourselves are at our ease, our senses will never inform us of what he suffers. They never did, and never can, carry us beyond our own person, and it is by the imagination only that we can form any conception of what are his sensations. Neither can that faculty help us to this any other way, than by representing to us what would be our own, if we were in his case. It is the impressions of our own senses only, not those of his, which our imaginations copy. By the imagination we place ourselves in his situation, we conceive ourselves enduring all the same torments, we enter as it were into his body, and become in some measure the same person with him, and thence form some idea of his sensations, and even feel something which, though weaker in degree, is not altogether unlike them. His agonies, when they are thus brought home to ourselves, when we have thus adopted and made them our own, begin at last to affect us, and we then tremble and shudder at the thought of what he feels. For as to be in pain or distress of any kind excites the most excessive sorrow, so to conceive or to imagine that we are in it, excites some degree of the same emotion, in proportion to the vivacity or dulness of the conception.

That this is the source of our fellow-feeling for the misery of others, that it is by changing places in fancy with the sufferer, that we come either to conceive or to be affected by what he feels, may be demonstrated by many obvious observations, if it should not be thought sufficiently evident of itself. When we see a stroke aimed and just ready to fall upon the leg or arm of another person, we naturally shrink and draw back our own leg or our own arm; and when it does fall, we feel it in some measure, and are hurt by it as well as the sufferer.
The mob, when they are gazing at a dancer on the slack rope, naturally writhe and twist and balance their own bodies, as they see him do, and as they feel that they themselves must do if in his situation.
Persons of delicate fibres and a weak constitution of body complain, that in looking on the sores and ulcers which are exposed by beggars in the streets, they are apt to feel an itching or uneasy sensation in the correspondent part of their own bodies. The horror which they conceive at the misery of those wretches affects that particular part in themselves more than any other; because that horror arises from conceiving what they themselves would suffer, if they really were the wretches whom they are looking upon, and if that particular part in themselves was actually affected in the same miserable manner. The very force of this conception is sufficient, in their feeble frames, to produce that itching or uneasy sensation complained of. Men of the most robust make, observe that in looking upon sore eyes they often

—

1 Cf. vii.iii.1.