In Freudian Repression, Michael Billig presents an original reformulation of Freud's concept of repression, showing that in his theory of the unconscious he fails to examine how people actually repress shameful thoughts. Drawing on recent insights from discursive psychology, Billig suggests that in learning to speak we also learn what not to say: language is thus both expressive and repressive. He applies this perspective to some of Freud's classic case histories such as 'Dora' and the 'Rat Man' and the great psychologist's own life to show the importance of small words in speech. By focusing on previously overlooked exchanges, even Freud himself can be seen to be repressing. Freudian Repression also offers new insights on the current debate about recovered memories and the ideological background to psychoanalysis which will guarantee its interdisciplinary appeal to psychologists, language theorists, discourse analysts, students of psychoanalysis, literary studies and sociologists.

Michael Billig is Professor of Social Sciences at Loughborough University. He has published extensively. His most recent book Banal Nationalism (1995) was awarded the Myers Centre Award for 'outstanding work on intolerance'.
Freudian Repression

Conversation Creating the Unconscious

Michael Billig
Contents

Acknowledgements vi

1 Introduction 1
2 The importance of repression 12
3 Thinking, speaking and repressing 38
4 Language, politeness and desire 71
5 Oedipal desires and Oedipal parents 104
6 Remembering to forget 141
7 Words of unconscious love 184
8 Repressing an oppressed identity 216
9 Ideological implications 253

References 262
Subject index 282
Name index 286
Acknowledgements

When academics gather together these days, you can frequently hear them complaining – about their colleagues, their departments, their ‘line managers’. I feel smugly out of things. At Loughborough, in the Department of Social Sciences and in the Discourse and Rhetoric Group, I am privileged to work among talented, generous colleagues. In Peter Golding, I have a head of department who bravely and selflessly ensures that academic values prevail and that we can still enjoy ideas for their own sake.

This book has benefited greatly from discussions with members of the Discourse and Rhetoric Group, who have shown again and again how intellectual disagreement can be enjoyed in a spirit of humour and understanding. For their particular comments, I would like to thank Charles Antaki, Malcolm Ashmore, Derek Edwards, Celia Kitzinger, Katie Macmillan, Dave Middleton, Jonathan Potter and Claudia Puchta. But all the members of the group have contributed to providing an intellectual environment, in which the present manuscript could rebelliously develop.

I am grateful to my other department colleagues, who have also taken time to read chapters or discuss particular points, allowing me to raid their own expertise shamelessly. I am particularly grateful to Mike Gane, Angela McRobbie, Graham Murdock, Mike Pickering and Alan Radley. But, in truth, I should thank all my colleagues for ensuring that the Department is more than two corridors of separate offices. It is a genuine intellectual home.

I am fortunate, also, in there being people outside my department who in various ways have given support and help. In this regard, I would particularly like to thank: Halla Beloff, Becky Billig, Erica Burman, Susan Condor, Ken Gergen, Mary Gergen, Helen Haste, Bruce Mazlish, Ian Parker, Tom Scheff, Teun van Dijk, Ida Wåksberg and Margaret Wetherell. As always, I would like to acknowledge the transatlantic friendship and warm support of John Shotter and Herb Simons.

Parts of chapter 5 were published in Culture and Psychology and parts of chapter 8 in Theory, Culture and Society. I am grateful to the editors of those journals, and to Sage their publisher, for allowing extracts to be used again.
Acknowledgements

As I look back on the acknowledgements in my previous books, I am aware that someone has always been omitted. There could be few excuses for continuing this omission in a book about Freud. So, as I thank once more Sheila and our children for so much, I must not, this time, forget my mother. Thanks to you all.