Focusing on key works of late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century American literary realism, Phillip Barrish traces the emergence of new ways of gaining intellectual prestige— that is, new ways of gaining cultural recognition as unusually intelligent, sensitive, or even wise. Through extended readings of works by Henry James, William Dean Howells, Abraham Cahan, and Edith Wharton, Barrish emphasizes the differences between literary realist modes of intellectual and cultural authority and those associated with the rise of the social sciences. In doing so, he also greatly refines our understanding of the complex relationship between realist writing and masculinity. Barrish further argues that understanding the dynamics of intellectual status in realist literature provides new analytic purchase on intellectual prestige in recent theory. Here he focuses on such figures as Lionel Trilling, Paul de Man, John Guillory, and Judith Butler.

Phillip Barrish is Assistant Professor in the Department of English, University of Texas, Austin. He has published essays in such journals as American Literary History, Victorian Studies, and Diacritics. This is his first book.
In memory of my mother and in honor of my father
Contents

Acknowledgments

Introduction

1 William Dean Howells and the roots of realist taste

2 The “facts of physical suffering,” the literary intellectual, and The Wings of the Dove

3 The “genuine article”: credit and ethnicity in The Rise of David Levinsky

4 What Nona knows

5 From reality, to materiality, to the real (and back again): the dynamics of distinction on the recent critical scene

Notes

Bibliography

Index
Acknowledgements

In one way and another (and frequently in more ways than one), the following people helped to make this book possible.

Mark Seltzer, Cynthia Chase, Debra Fried, and Harry Shaw helped to guide my early thinking and writing about the topic. More recently, astute readings were given to portions of the manuscript by Brian Bremen, Evan Carton, Ann Cvetkovich, Alyssa Harad, Theresa Kelley, Jeff Nunokawa, Samuel Otter, Margit Stange, Warwick Wadlington, and Michael Winship. Amanda Anderson made insightful suggestions at various stages of the project. For having read the whole manuscript and helping to shape the book as it stands, I am greatly indebted to Sabrina Barton, Lisa Moore, David McWhirter, Ross Posnock, Julie Rivkin, and two anonymous readers for Cambridge University Press. For invaluable research assistance, I thank Rayce Boucher, Laura Broms, and Michael Martin. Without the latter, I don’t know if I could have gotten through the final months of manuscript preparation. At several pinches along the way, Lisa Brown’s generosity with her time gave me much-needed extra hours of work.

The University of Texas at Austin helped to support this project by awarding me a Dean’s Fellowship and two summer research grants, as well as providing funds to pay my research assistants. I am grateful to James Garrison for helping to facilitate that support. I also thank the University of California at Davis for important aid at earlier stages of the project. A version of chapter 3 appeared in American Literary History, and I appreciate their permission to reprint it.

Sabrina Barton is my best reader, my best interlocutor, and my best friend. Elijah Barton Barrish is awesome. Both make me feel luckier than I can express.