

Contents

List of figures	page	xi
Introduction: About the Meditations		I
1 The situation of the Meditator is described and his desire to demolish everything and begin again is explored, while the Reader is introduced to some basic philosophical concepts		IO
1 The Meditator – The building metaphor – “Knowledge conditions” – Scientific and unscientific mentalities (AT VII:17–18)		IO
2 The aims of an ideal scientist – Sorting-procedures – Belief-sets – Skepticism and credulity – Conformity and authority (AT VII:18)		2I
2 Meditation One
The possibility of a malevolent Demon is raised and the Meditator resolves to doubt everything he can possibly doubt		32
1 The Withholding Policy – Can the senses be trusted? – The dream argument – The malevolent Demon argument (AT VII:18–23)		32
2 Objections to Meditation One		45
3 Meditation Two
The Meditator discovers an indubitable proposition and continues with an investigation into her ideas of herself and her ideas of corporeal things		50
1 Hyperbolic Doubt – An addition to the Meditator’s belief-set – “Cogito, sum” (AT VII:23–5)		50

viii	Contents
2	What am “I?” – Former opinions doubted – “I” must be a mind – Seeing<sub>1</sub> and Seeing<sub>2</sub> (AT VII:25–30)	57
3	What are “corporeal things?” – Knowledge of [ideas of] corporeal things – The “piece of wax” – Extension – Intellect priority – Mind priority (AT VII:30–34)	62
4	Objections to Meditation Two	68
4	Meditation Three (I) The Meditator discovers how to distinguish true from false propositions by reference to the clarity and distinctness of his ideas and considers whether God is merely a subjective idea	78
1	Clear and distinct perception – Truth (AT VII:34–6)	78
2	Is the Deity (malevolent or benevolent) merely an idea? – Ideas and their sources – Substance, modes, accidents – Degrees of reality and degrees of perfection – Materially false ideas (AT VII:36–46)	86
3	Objections to Meditation Three (I)	94
5	Meditation Three (II) The Meditator finds that he can reach a perfect God in his thoughts and that this God cannot perpetrate fraud and deception and cannot be a Demon	97
1	Is God more than the Meditator’s invented idea? – Could the Meditator be God – ? Continuous creation (AT VII:46–51)	97
2	God is veracious – The malevolent Demon is an invented idea – The natural light – The conversion of BELIEVE to TRUE – Attaining knowledge (AT VII:51–2)	103
3	Objections to Meditation Three (II)	106
6	Meditation Four (I) The Meditator broods on her epistemological and moral errors and deficiencies and discovers the true power of her will and its spontaneous attraction to truth and goodness	120
1	True and false judgment – Divine and human will – The use of free will (AT VII:52–8)	120
7	Meditation Four (II) The Meditator diagnoses the cause of her epistemological and moral errors, adds an

Contents	ix
error-prevention rule to her knowledge-set, and confirms that God is truly benevolent	133
1 Error – The denial of final causes – Divine goodness (AT vii:58–62)	133
2 Objections to Meditation Four	139
8 Meditation Five
The Meditator reflects on his experiences of mathematical and abstract concepts and arrives at a proof of God’s existence	152
1 The essential nature of corporeal substance – Category 1 and Category 2 properties – Mathematical objects and mathematical truths – Triangles, unicorns, and God – Realism and Psychologism (AT vii:63–5)	152
2 The Ontological Argument – Could God (still) be a fictional entity? – Necessary existence (AT vii:65–71)	161
3 Objections to Meditation Five	167
9 Meditation Six (I)
The Meditator determines that he is apparently attached to a particular human body. His mind and this putative body are nevertheless distinct and separable, so that immortality is possible even if bodies in general are perishable	170
1 Visual imagination – The Meditator’s putative body (AT vii:72–8)	170
2 Mortalism – Distinct existence – Separability of mind and body – Perception and imagination are not essential to the Meditator (AT vii:78)	176
3 Objections to Meditation Six (I)	182
10 Meditation Six (II)
The Meditator establishes that extramental corporeal things definitely exist, confirms that she has a personal body to which she is united, and learns that neither her sensations nor her perceptions resemble their causes in the external world	195
1 The active cause of ideas – Corporeal things exist (AT vii:78–80)	195

x	Contents
2	The resemblance theory of sensation refuted – God–Nature as an orderly system – The unity of mind and body – Sensations are confused (AT vii:80–1)	198
3	The resemblance theory of perception questioned (AT vii:81–3)	204
4	The functional body-machine – The semantic theory of sensation and perception (AT vii:83–4)	209
5	Objections to Meditation Six (II)	212
II	Meditation Six (III)
	The Meditator learns how her body is organized, and discovers why her illnesses, like her errors, suggest that God is benevolent, and determines that she can proceed confidently in all the sciences	215
1	Sensory error – The sick body and its sensations – The nervous system (AT vii:84–9)	215
2	The end of doubt (AT vii:89–90)	219
3	Objections to Meditation Six (III)	224
12	Descartes in context	230
1	The enigma of the Meditations	230
2	Some reactions to Cartesianism	238
3	Reception and repercussions of Cartesian doctrine in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century philosophy	241
4	Descartes and the formation of modernity	250
	Appendix: the Objectors	256
	Glossary	258
	Further reading	262
	Index	266