While there are many studies of nineteenth-century race theories and scientific racism, the attitudes and stereotypes expressed in popular culture have rarely been examined, and then only for the latter half of the century. Theatre then was mass entertainment and these forgotten plays, hastily written, surviving only as handwritten manuscripts or cheap pamphlets, are a rich seam for the cultural historian. Mining them to discover how ‘race’ was viewed and how the stereotype of the black developed and degraded sheds a fascinating light on the development of racism in English culture. In the process, this book helps to explain how a certain flexibility in attitudes towards skin colour, observable at the end of the eighteenth century, changed into the hardened jingoism of the late nineteenth. Concentrating on the period 1830 to 1860, its detailed excavation of some seventy plays makes it invaluable to the theatre historian and black studies scholar.

HAZEL WATERS is co-editor of the journal Race & Class, and has had many articles published in the area of racism and theatre. This is her first book.
RACISM ON THE VICTORIAN STAGE

Representation of Slavery and the Black Character

HAZEL WATERS
Contents

List of illustrations vi
Acknowledgements vii

Introduction 1
1 From vengeance to sentiment 7
2 The beginning of the end for the black avenger 37
3 Ira Aldridge and the battlefield of race 58
4 The comic and the grotesque: the American influence 89
5 The consolidation of the black grotesque 114
6 Slavery freed from the constraint of blackness 130
7 Uncle Tom – moral high ground or low comedy? 155

Afterword 186

Notes 191
Bibliography 227
Index 240
Illustrations

1. The Victorian audience as seen by Phiz
   ‘Pantomime night’, Illustrated London News (8 January 1848), courtesy of Senate House Library, University of London

   Page 3

2. Edmund Kean as Othello
   courtesy of V&A Images/Theatre Museum

   Page 45

3. Karfa about to kill Quashee in Obi
   Frontispiece, Dicks, no. 478, Malcolm Morley Library, Senate House Library, University of London

   Page 68

4. Fabian and Pauline in The Black Doctor
   Frontispiece, Dicks, no. 460, Malcolm Morley Library, Senate House Library, University of London

   Page 78

5. Charles Mathews’s American characters, including Agamemnon
   courtesy of V&A Images/Theatre Museum

   Page 92

6. T. D. Rice as himself and as Jim Crow
   courtesy of V&A Images/Theatre Museum

   Page 97

7. Juba performing in London in 1848
   Illustrated London News (5 August 1848), courtesy of Senate House Library, University of London

   Page 101

8. The Ethiopian Serenaders
   Illustrated London News (24 January 1846), courtesy of Senate House Library, University of London

   Page 117

9. The Creole: Latour (centre) witnesses the exposure he has contrived
   Frontispiece, Dicks, no. 1009, Malcolm Morley Library, Senate House Library, University of London

   Page 145

10. Uncle Tom’s Cabin at the Olympic
    Illustrated London News (2 October 1852), courtesy of Senate House Library, University of London

    Page 163
Acknowledgements

This book has been a long time in the making, and the thanks I owe to friends, colleagues, scholars and fellow students are many and various. What I owe to my truest friend and comrade, A. Sivanandan, Director of the Institute of Race Relations, is incalculable, not only for his inspiration and encouragement over many years but also for his tireless generosity of spirit. It has been both privilege and fulfilment to work at the IRR as Siva’s colleague and co-editor of Race & Class for almost four decades; writing this book would not have been possible without him. My friends and colleagues – really dearest family – at the IRR – Jenny Bourne, Liz Fekete, Harmit Athwal and Arun Kundnani – have all helped and supported me more than I can say, with ideas, criticisms and suggestions, and readings and rereadings of parts of the manuscript, as well as with taking on extra work themselves in order to free my time. Thank you.

And I owe a debt of gratitude to Michael Slater, Emeritus Professor and Fellow of Birkbeck College, who first got me hooked on Victorian theatre, and guided and directed my research with the most skilful of hands. This book has been greatly enriched by his enthusiasm and encyclopaedic knowledge. Professor Nicola Bown, also of Birkbeck, gave me invaluable advice and comments, for which I heartily thank her. And I must also mention my fellow students from the Victorian studies MA course at Birkbeck, who developed the same passion for Victorian theatre – especially Anna Brown, Terri Natale, Sally Sanderson and Rachel Summerson.

To Jan Carew, Guyanese historian and writer, and Emeritus Professor of Northwestern University, I owe great thanks, not only for his encouragement but for generous gifts of material not available in Britain. As I do to Bernth Lindfors, Emeritus Professor of the University of Texas, Austin, who has given freely of his knowledge, expertise and most recent research, as well as documents not otherwise available to me. The bulk of my research has been carried out in the British Library and the University of London Library; to their staffs, always helpful despite the increasing pressure on their services, my sincere gratitude. Thanks, too, to Professor Cedric Robinson, University of California at Santa Barbara, whose work is truly exemplary; Professor Avery Gordon, UCSB; Professor Barbara Harlow, University of Texas, Austin; Professor Neil Lazarus, University of Warwick; Marika Sherwood; and my friend and former colleague, Tessa Hosking.

My husband, John Drinkwater, has not only helped in ways too numerous to mention, but has borne the brunt of my obsession with this research over many years, keeping it and me going. It could never have been completed otherwise. But, despite the fact that, in many ways, this book has been a collective enterprise, all its errors are mine alone.