REALISM, PHOTOGRAPHY, AND NINETEENTH-CENTURY FICTION

This radically new account of the relationship between photography and literary realism in Victorian Britain draws on detailed readings of photographs, writings about photography, and fiction by Charles Dickens, George Eliot, and Oscar Wilde. While other critics have argued that photography defined what would be “real” for literary fiction, Daniel A. Novak demonstrates that photography itself was associated with the unreal – with fiction and the literary imagination. Once we acknowledge that manipulation was essential rather than incidental to the project of nineteenth-century realism, our understanding of the relationship between photography and fiction changes in important ways. Novak argues that while realism may seem to make claims to particularity and individuality, both in fiction and in photography, it relies much more on typicality than on perfect reproduction. Illustrated with many photographs, this book represents an important contribution to current debates on the nature of Victorian realism.

DANIEL A. NOVAK is Assistant Professor of English at Louisiana State University.
Nineteenth-century British literature and culture have been rich fields for interdisciplinary studies. Since the turn of the twentieth century, scholars and critics have tracked the intersections and tensions between Victorian literature and the visual arts, polities, social organization, economic life, technical innovations, scientific thought – in short, culture in its broadest sense. In recent years, theoretical challenges and historiographical shifts have unsettled the assumptions of previous scholarly synthesis and called into question the terms of older debates. Whereas the tendency in much past literary critical interpretation was to use the metaphor of culture as “background,” feminist, Foucauldian, and other analyses have employed more dynamic models that raise questions of power and of circulation. Such developments have reanimated the field. This series aims to accommodate and promote the most interesting work being undertaken on the frontiers of the field of nineteenth-century literary studies: work which intersects fruitfully with other fields of study such as history, or literary theory, or the history of science. Comparative as well as interdisciplinary approaches are welcomed.

A complete list of titles published will be found at the end of the book.
REALISM, PHOTOGRAPHY, AND NINETEENTH-CENTURY FICTION

DANIEL A. NOVAK
For Maximillian and Estelle Novak: my first and best professors and
To Daphne: for turning my myths, fictions, and dreams into reality
Contents

List of illustrations page viii
Acknowledgments xiii

Introduction: “detestable introductions” 1

1 Missing persons and model bodies: Victorian photographic figures 36

2 Composing the novel body: re-membering the body and the text in Little Dorrit 63

3 A model Jew: “literary photographs” and the Jewish body in Daniel Deronda 90

4 Sexuality in the age of technological reproducibility: Wilde, photography, and identity 118

After-image: surviving the photograph 146

Notes 152
Selected bibliography 203
Index 223
Illustrations

Frontispiece: Oscar Gustav Rejlander: The Two Ways of Life (1857)

INTRODUCTION

1. Henry Peach Robinson: studies for Bringing Home the May (1862)
   Reproduced by permission of the National Media Museum, Bradford, UK/Science and Society Picture Library, London

2. Oscar Gustav Rejlander: study for The Two Ways of Life (c. 1857)
   Reproduced by permission of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York

3. Anon: Christ’s head on a leaf (1839)

4. Photo collage: from the album of Lady Celia Jocelyn (c. 1860)
   Reproduced by permission of the National Portrait Gallery, London

5. Ashford Brothers & Company: mosaic card with 500 portraits (1862–63)
   Reproduced by permission of Special Collections, the Pennsylvania State University Libraries, the B. & H. Henisch Photo-History Collection

6. William Notman: Miss Stevenson as “Photography” (1865)
   Reproduced by permission of the McCord Museum of Canadian History

7. Anon: montage of the royal family (1860–1861?)
   Reproduced by permission of the National Portrait Gallery, London

8. Georgiana Berkeley: woman sitting on the back of a pink flamingo, small girl sitting on the back of a tortoise. Cavendish Family Album (c. 1866)
List of illustrations

Reproduced by permission of the Musée D’Orsay, Paris/
Réunion des Musées Nationaux, Paris / Art Resource, New York
9. Georgiana Berkeley: two young children, with the portraits of Louisa and Cecilia Cavendish (between 1860 and 1870)
Reproduced by permission of the Musée D’Orsay, Paris/
Réunion des Musées Nationaux, Paris / Art Resource, New York
10. Family Album: Kate Gough (1870s)
Reproduced by permission of V & A Images/Victoria and Albert Museum, London
11. Oscar Gustav Rejlander: study of a shoe-black (c. 1860s–1870s?)
From The Photographic Times and American Photographer,
16 (1886)
12. Oscar Gustav Rejlander: study for The Martyrdom of
St. Sebastian (c. 1860s–1870s?)
From The Photographic Times and American Photographer,
16 (1886)
13. Oscar Gustav Rejlander: The Head of John the Baptist in a
Charger (1857–58)
Reproduced by permission of the Royal Photographic Society,
Bath, UK/National Media Museum, Bradford, UK/Science
and Society Picture Library, London
Reproduced by permission of the Gernsheim Collection, Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center, The University of Texas
at Austin
15. Henry Peach Robinson: Fading Away (1858)
Reproduced by permission of the Science Museum, London/
Science and Society Picture Library, London
16. Henry Peach Robinson: study for Fading Away (c. 1858)
Reproduced by permission of the Royal Photographic Society,
Bath, UK/National Media Museum, Bradford, UK/Science
and Society Picture Library, London
17. Oscar Gustav Rejlander: study of hands (1855–1860)
Reproduced by permission of the Gernsheim Collection, Harry
Ransom Humanities Research Center, The University of Texas
at Austin
18. Oscar Gustav Rejlander: study of feet (c. 1856)
Reproduced by permission of the Gernsheim Collection, Harry
Ransom Humanities Research Center, The University of Texas
at Austin
List of illustrations

CHAPTER 1

1. “Art Progress”: Punch cartoon (1857) Reproduced courtesy of Louisiana State University Libraries Special Collections 41

CHAPTER 2

1. Oscar Gustav Rejlander: Poor Jo (1860) Reproduced by permission of the George Eastman House, Rochester, NY, USA 65
3. Ary Scheffer: Charles Dickens (1855) Reproduced by permission of the National Portrait Gallery, London 73

CHAPTER 3

List of illustrations

3. Francis Galton: Omnibus Plate of Composites (c. 1878) 97
   From Karl Pearson, The Life, Letters, and Labours of Francis Galton (1924)
   Reprinted by permission of The Galton Collection, University College London and Cambridge University Press

4. Francis Galton: Composites of Thoroughbreds (c. 1878) 98
   From Karl Pearson, The Life, Letters, and Labours of Francis Galton (1924)
   Reprinted by permission of The Galton Collection, University College London and Cambridge University Press

5. Francis Galton: Composites made from Portraits of Criminals Convicted of Murder (c. 1878) 99
   From Karl Pearson, The Life, Letters, and Labours of Francis Galton (1924)
   Reprinted by permission of The Galton Collection, University College London and Cambridge University Press

6. Francis Galton: The Jewish Type (c. 1880) 102
   From Karl Pearson, The Life, Letters, and Labours of Francis Galton (1924)
   Reprinted by permission of The Galton Collection, University College London and Cambridge University Press

CHAPTER 4

1. Illustration from The Life Sexual (1905) – photography by Napoleon Sarony (1882) 119
   Reproduced by permission of the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, Los Angeles

2. Illustration from The Life Sexual (1905) – Photography by Napoleon Sarony (1882) 120
   Reproduced by permission of the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, Los Angeles

   Reproduced by permission of Arnold Roth and Andrew Borowitz

4. Napoleon Sarony: Oscar Wilde (1882) 129
   Reproduced by permission of the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, Los Angeles

5. Napoleon Sarony: Oscar Wilde (1882) 130
   Reproduced by permission of the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, Los Angeles

6. Napoleon Sarony: Oscar Wilde – image copied illegally (no.18) (1882) 133
List of illustrations

7. Napoleon Sarony: Oscar Wilde – image copied illegally (no. 11) (1882)
   Reproduced courtesy of the Library of Congress

8. Lithograph using Sarony’s photograph of Wilde (1882)
   Reproduced by permission of the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, Los Angeles
Acknowledgments

In his text, the writer sets up house. Just as he trundles papers, books, pencils, documents untidily from room to room, he creates the same disorder in his thoughts. They become pieces of furniture that he sinks into, content or irritable. He strokes them affectionately, wears them out, mixes them up, re-arranges, ruins them. For a man who no longer has a homeland, writing becomes a place to live. In it he inevitably produces, as his family once did, refuse and lumber. But now he lacks a store-room, and it is hard in any case to part from left-overs. So he pushes them along in front of him, in danger finally of filling his pages with them.

Theodor Adorno, Minima Moralia

I open this acknowledgment with Theodor Adorno’s half-nostalgic, half-despairing account of his life in and of writing not merely to confess the “untidiness” of my desk or the disorder of my thoughts – although I am certainly guilty of the first and perhaps of the second. Instead, it is Adorno’s affection for the refuse of writing that attracts me to this passage. Having begun the research and writing at the heart of this book as an undergraduate at the University of California, Los Angeles, I have been carrying these thoughts (sometimes literally) on my back from place to place for a long time, surely (as friends have joked) like my grandparents in the shtetls of the Ukraine and Bohemia carried their belongings. Unlike Adorno, however, I have not had to rely on writing alone for a home. The friends and mentors I have found and who have found me over the course of my education and career have collectively given me both a “homeland” and a home in the familiar and hospitable spaces of academia – the seminar-room and the office, the living-room and the bar.

Attempting to thank all of those people is, of course, impossible in the narrow space I have here. Thanks go to my undergraduate thesis advisors Kenneth Reinhard and Al Hutter for their infinite patience. At Princeton, I was lucky enough to work with Elaine Showalter, Jeff Nunokawa, and Eduardo Cadava, without whose intelligence, generosity, encouragement, and kindness, I would not have been able to finish (or begin) this project. Thanks also go both to my professors and mentors – all of whom expanded my sense of what it means to think, read, and write: Jonathan Lamb, Earl Miner, Larry Danson, Oliver Arnold, Deborah Nord, Uli Knoepflmacher,
Michael Jennings, Claudia Johnson, Esther Schor, Susan Wolfson, Michael Wood, and Diana Fuss.

It is also impossible to adequately thank all of my colleagues from graduate school who have been and remain essential to my intellectual life. To only name a few: Chris Rovee, Stuart Burrows, Gage McWeeny, Hollis Robbins, and Julie Barmazel. Paul Kelleher has proven to be the most intelligent reader and the best friend I have known. At Louisiana State University, I have been blessed with brilliant and kind colleagues. I owe more than I can say to my writing group – Sharon Weltman, Elsie Michie, and Pallavi Rastogi – whom I trust implicitly. Thanks also go to the departmental chairs and administrators at Louisiana State University who have generously supported my work: Malcolm Richardson, Anna Nardo, Dean Guillermo Ferreyra, and Assistant Vice Chancellor Todd Pourciau. Finally, I have had the good fortune to find mentors outside of my institutions. Both Nancy Armstrong and Joseph Bristow have always shown me a kindness and generosity that I can never repay.

This book has been made possible through the support of a number of generous organizations and grants: Donald and Mary Hyde’s Fellowship for Short-Term Fellowship for Research Abroad in the Humanities, The William Andrews Clark Memorial Library’s Short Term Fellowship for Research, and Louisiana State University’s Council on Research and Manship fellowships. This project is also indebted to numerous archives and their curators. Special thanks to Merlin Holland for his generous interest and liberality with all things regarding Oscar Wilde, and to the curators of the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library (especially Suzanne Tatian and Scott Jacobs); the Victoria and Albert Museum; the National Portrait Gallery of London; the Metropolitan Museum of Art; the Royal Photographic Society; the Science and Society Picture Library; the National Media Museum; the Musée d’Orsay; the Réunion des Musées Nationaux; Art Resource; the George Eastman House; University College London; the McCord Museum; Penn State University Special Collections; The Getty Center Research Library; the Library of Congress; and the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center.

An earlier version of chapter 3 was published as “A Model Jew” in Representations 85 (Winter 2004), and material from chapter 1 was published in Novel: A Forum on Fiction 32:1 (Fall 1997). Thanks to the editors of Novel and Representations for allowing me to reprint this material. Of course, this book has been made possible by the wonderful editors and readers at Cambridge University Press (with special thanks to Linda Bree and Gillian Beer), and I cannot thank them enough for their support.

Lastly, I’d like to thank those who have made my life possible in all senses: my parents – Doctors Maximillian and Estelle Novak – who are still teaching me how to live and read; and my wife, Daphne Cain, whose liveliness, passion, and intelligence continue to inspire me.