The Permissive Society points to the emergence of a liberalizing impulse during the Truman and Eisenhower years in contrast to those who see the 1950s as a conservative period and who view the 1960s as a time of rapid moral change. The book shows how a traditionalist moral framework was beginning to give way during the 1950s to a less authoritarian approach to moral issues as demonstrated by a more relaxed style of childrearing, the rising status of women both inside and outside the home, the increasing reluctance of Americans to regard alcoholism as a sin, loosening sexual attitudes, the increasing influence of modern psychology, and the declining influence of religion in the personal lives of most Americans.

Alan Petigny, the son of West Indian immigrants, is an Assistant Professor of History at the University of Florida. He graduated with honors from the University of South Florida and received his master’s and doctorate degrees from Brown University. Before becoming an academic, Petigny worked as a policy analyst for the U.S. Congress’s Joint Economic Committee. He was also an award-winning reporter for a public radio station based in Tampa, Florida, contributing material to both Florida Public Radio and National Public Radio.
“In the past few years, historians have begun to disassemble the stereotypes of the 1950s, rejecting the descriptions of a uniformly rigid, conservative, and dour society. With Alan Petigny’s astute and surprising book, this demolition project hits with full force. Focusing on liberal religion and the widespread popularity of psychology, counseling, and the ideals of identity-fulfillment, the author describes a very different society in the making, in which permissive behavior rejected the strident calls for Cold War conformism. Contrarian in the very best sense of the term, this remarkable book transforms what we thought we knew about the postwar world, restoring balance, common sense, and dispassionate perspective to the history of the period.”

– James Gilbert, University of Maryland

“In The Permissive Society, Petigny finds new indicators of behavioral change in sources neglected by cultural historians. His documentation of a permissive turn in the 1940s and 1950s provides a marvelous antidote to the naïve narratives of social change that clutter the canon of post–World War II cultural history. Both conservatives and progressives will benefit from careful study of this fascinating lesson in how cultural norms changed in response to new social realities.”

– James Reed, Rutgers University

“With The Permissive Society, Alan Petigny gives revisionist history a good name. With freshness of perspective, deftness of design, and ingenuity of research, he proposes to find in the 1950s the seeds of the democratic change associated with the 1960s – and thus makes both decades more intriguing. The Permissive Society is a work that social and cultural historians of the postwar era will have to reckon with, and that anyone interested in a cogent scholarly argument is bound to enjoy.”

– Stephen J. Whitfield, Brandeis University
The Permissive Society

America, 1941–1965

ALAN PETIGNY

University of Florida
This book is dedicated to the memory of my father,

Rene Petigny.
Contents

Acknowledgments
Introduction: World War II, the Ascendancy of Science, and the Prologue to the Permissive Turn 1

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>Psychology: Benjamin Spock, Carl Rogers, and the Liberalizing Impulse in the 1950s</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>Religion: Ballrooms, Bingo, Blue Laws, and Billy Graham – Piety and Secularization in 1950s America</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53</td>
<td>Sex: Ingrid Bergman, Elizabeth Taylor, and the Sexual Revolution in the Postwar Period</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>100</td>
<td>Feminism: The Rising Status of Women in the Age of Eisenhower</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>134</td>
<td>Youth Culture: Rock ‘n’ Roll, Blue Jeans, and the Myth of Opposition</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>179</td>
<td>The Self: From Original Sin to Self-Actualization – Jackson Pollock, Charlie Parker, and New Notions of Identity in Postwar America</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>224</td>
<td>Denouement: The Normative Lag and the Role of Religion in the Transformation of American Culture</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>249</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Archives
283

Index
285
Many people helped bring this book to fruition. Foremost among them is my dissertation committee at Brown University which comprised James T. Patterson, Jack Thomas, and Howard Chudacoff. Jim Patterson, in particular, deserves credit for molding me into an historian, not an easy task. Graduate students are notoriously thin-skinned but Jim was patient with me and I hope he is pleased with the final product. Two senior scholars, Donald Critchlow and Larry Friedman, external to Brown and not part of my dissertation committee, acted as mentors and spent hours reading drafts and pushing me to think harder about the issues I raised. Likewise, Howard University’s Daryl Scott spent more than 25 hours over 10 days reading aloud with me every word of my dissertation and offering his critique. It was an act of generosity for which I will always be grateful.

Early in my graduate student career, a daylong workshop was held at the George Mason University School of Law where several scholars provided feedback on one of my early chapters. This workshop featured an All Star lineup of Donald Critchlow, Alan Brinkley, Francis Fukuyama, James Jones, James Gilbert, Roy Rosenzweig, and Leo Ribuffo. It was an incredible experience, and I would like to thank them again for their generosity.

I also appreciate the support and constructive criticism I received from the community of graduate students at Brown University. They included Jim Sparrow, Ray Douglas, Robert Fleegler, Joshua Zietz, Peter Baldwin, Dan Williams, David Farbman, Margaret Crosby, Kevin Cloud, Alyssa Lodewick, Mark Herlihy (a true mental giant), and Julie Des Jardins. At the University of Florida, I was given critical feedback by my colleagues Jeff Adler, Robert McMahon, Eldon Turner, Matt Gallman, x

Acknowledgments

John Sommerville, Betty Smocovitas, Louise Neman, Mitch Hart, Bertram Wyatt-Brown, Richard Horner, Jay Langdale, Randall Stephens, and Ken Wald. My undergraduate professors, Stephen Lawson and Nancy Hewett, also read and commented on sections of my manuscript. At Princeton University there was Robert Wuthnow of the Center for the Study of Religion, Andrew Jewett, Healan Gaston, as well as Rutgers University’s James Reed, Gerald Grob, and Kieth Wailoo, and the University of Denver’s David Ciepley. Brandeis University’s Stephen Whitfield and University of Alabama’s David Beito, two exceptional scholars and friends, took time to read and comment on draft chapters. Finally, due to my modest mathematical skills, I turned to three very capable economists to help me crunch numbers: William Doerner, Garth Brazelton, and my old racquetball partner John Bowblis, currently on the faculty of the Economics Department at Miami University in Ohio.

With respect to my prose, freelance editors Henry Butler, Michael Garvin, Michael Bagen, Dona Perkins, Matt Walker, and my former master’s student Ryan Boyle, helped make this book more readable. Brown professors Patricia Herlihy, Karl Jacoby, and Hilary Silver showered me with many helpful suggestions. I also received assistance from Peter Levin, Mitch Bainwol, Jeff Styles, Mark Henrie, Steven Brust, Wilfred McClay, Leonard Liggio, Doug Den Uyl, Ingrid Gregg, Lyn Downey, Kathleen Laughlin (who helped me develop my chapter on women in the 1950s), Sherill Sunseri, and Oneshin Aiken. Additionally, this list would not be complete without mentioning the patience, understanding, and support of my editor, Eric Crahan, and his team at Cambridge Press.

On a final note, I would like to thank my mother Pearl, older brothers Arthur and Ludlow, and sisters Michelle and Sheila for their encouragement as I pursued my love of history.

Alan Petigny
March 2008

Note: Material appearing in Chapters 3 and 6 was previously published in the Journal of Social History (Fall 2004) and The Mailer Review (Fall 2007), respectively.