1 Constraining our theory of language	1
1.1 Language and evolution	1
1.2 Studies in syntactic theory	3
1.3 Studies in evolution	7
1.4 Studies in language evolution	10
1.5 Constraining the theory of language	16
1.6 A history of generative grammar	17
1.7 Minimalism – a program for syntactic theorising	21
1.8 Syntactic theory in the light of evolution: the book	36
2 Language as a perfect system	39
2.1 Introduction	39
2.2 The perfection of language	39
2.3 Perfection = adaptation?	49
2.4 Simply a matter of terminology?	53
2.5 Perfection in nature	60
2.6 Conclusions	68
3 Language as an evolvable system	70
3.1 Introduction	70
3.2 The simplicity of the minimalist language faculty	70
3.3 The complexity of the non-minimalist language faculty	72
3.4 Measuring complexity	77
3.5 The direction of evolution	81
3.6 Minimalist methodology	87
3.7 Minimalism and saltationism	91
3.8 Evolvability	96
3.9 Conclusions	110
4 Language as a recursive system	112
4.1 Introduction	112
4.2 What is recursion?	113

viii	Contents
	4.3 What's special about language?	129
	4.4 The uniqueness of recursion	134
	4.5 Language without recursion	150
	4.6 Conclusions	158
5	Language as a minimal system	160
	5.1 Introduction	160
	5.2 Degeneracy and imperfection in the system	161
	5.3 'Extra' operations and competing motivations	163
	5.4 What is meant by 'perfection' anyhow?	166
	5.5 An imperfection in the mapping process	170
	5.6 Stipulations without independent motivation	171
	5.7 Shifting the burden of explanation	175
	5.8 Phenomena left unexplained	178
	5.9 Conclusions	183
6	Towards an evolvable theory of syntax	185
	6.1 Evolution as a constraint on theories of language	185
	6.2 Reconciling minimalism and evolution	186
	6.3 Evolutionarily plausible theories of language	188
	6.4 Final remarks	194
