From fires to ghosts, and from flowers to surrealist apparitions – the bombsites of London were both unsettling and inspiring terrains. Yet throughout the years prior to World War II, British culture was already filled with ruins and fragments. They appeared as content, with visions of tottering towers and scraps of paper; and also as form, in the shapes of broken poetics. But from the outbreak of the Second World War what had been an aesthetic mode began to resemble a proleptic template. During that conflict many modernist writers – such as Graham Greene, Louis MacNeice, David Jones, J. F. Hendry, Elizabeth Bowen, T. S. Eliot and Rose Macaulay – engaged with devastated cityscapes and the altered lives of a nation at war. To understand the potency of the bombsites, both in the Second World War and after, Reading the Ruins brings together poetry, novels and short stories – as well as film and visual art.

Leo Mellor is the Roma Gill Fellow in English and a Newton Trust Lecturer at Murray Edwards College, University of Cambridge. for my parents
Contents

List of illustrations

Acknowledgements

Introduction

1 Imagining destruction

2 A metropolis aflame

3 Surrealism and the bombsites

4 The haunted city

5 The new London jungle

Coda

Notes

Bibliography

Index
Illustrations

1 ‘If you tolerate this’. Poster, 1936–9
2 Graham Sutherland, cover for David Gascoyne’s Poems.
   (© Estate of Graham Sutherland)
3 Graham Sutherland, Devastation 1941: City, Twisted Girders.
   (© Estate of Graham Sutherland)
4 Graham Sutherland, Devastation 1941: City, Ruined Machinery in a Mantle Factory.
   (© Estate of Graham Sutherland)
5 Lee Miller, ‘1 Nonconformist Chapel + 1 bomb’, 1941.
   (© Lee Miller Archives, England, 2010; all rights reserved)
6 Lee Miller, ‘Blast pays tribute’, 1941.
   (© Lee Miller Archives, England, 2010; all rights reserved)
7 Lee Miller, ‘Women with fire masks, Downshire Hill, London, 1941’.
   (© Lee Miller Archives, England, 2010; all rights reserved)
8 Destroyed building around St Paul’s, 1945, from The London County Council Bomb Damage Maps.
   (© London Metropolitan Archives)
9 Specimens of rosebay willowherb in the Natural History Museum.
   (© Natural History Museum, London)
Parts of several chapters have appeared, in their earlier forms, as ‘Words from the Bombsites: Debris, Modernism and Literary Salvage’, in Critical Quarterly, 46:4, and as ‘War Journalism’ in The Cambridge Companion to Second World War Literature (2009). Other parts have been given as conference or symposia papers at the University of Cambridge, the Museum of Garden History, the University of Leeds and the Institute of English Studies, University of London.

I would like to thank the following for their advice, conversations and critiques over the long gestation of this book: Jenny Chamarette, Charlotte Charteris, the late Andrew Crozier, the late Roger Deakin, Daisy Hay, Michael Hurley, Nancy Hirst, James Kennaway, Jane Lewty, Anne Lonsdale, Raphael Lyne, Richard Mabey, Marina MacKay, Joe Moshenska, Jeremy Noel-Tod, Adam Piette, James Purdey, Mark Rawlinson, Sophie Read, Glyn Salton-Cox, David Trotter, Geoff Ward, Christopher Woodward and Patrick Wright. I would especially like to express deep gratitude to Neil Jones, Sean McEvoy, Robert Macfarlane, Elizabeth Lloyd, David Alan Mellor, Rod Mengham and Ian Patterson, who all read and commented on substantial parts of the manuscript.

My formative intellectual debts are to Diana Westlake, Judith Finn, Phillippa Berry, Peter de Bolla, Maud Ellmann, Nicky Zeeman and Laura Marcus. I also in turn now owe much to the Faculty of English at the University of Cambridge, the Newton Trust, and Murray Edwards College – as well as to my undergraduate and graduate students over the past five years.

The anonymous manuscript readers at Cambridge University Press were superbly helpful; Ray Ryan took on this project for the duration – and he has proved to be the epitome of an intellectually astute editor; Maartje Schletens and Gillian Dadd have attentively shepherded and cajoled the manuscript to this stage. Diolch yn fawr i bawb.

And to Zoë Svendsen I owe more than I can write.

ix