What does it mean to be a citizen in a multicultural society? And what role must patriotism play in defining our relationship with our country and fellow citizens? In The Virtuous Citizen Tim Soutphommasane answers these questions with a critical defence of liberal nationalism. Considering a range of contemporary political debates from Europe, North America and Australia, over issues including multiculturalism, national history, civic education and immigration, Soutphommasane argues that a love of country should be valued alongside tolerance, mutual respect and public reasonableness as a civic virtue. A liberal form of patriotism, grounded in national identity, is, if anything, essential for political stability in a diverse society. This book is required reading not only for political theorists and philosophers but also for researchers and professionals in political science, sociology, history and public policy.

Tim Soutphommasane is a lecturer at Monash University’s National Centre for Australian Studies in Melbourne. He is also a senior researcher with Per Capita, a public policy think tank. His other publications include Reclaiming Patriotism: Nation-Building for Australian Progressives.

The arguments in this book have been rehearsed in various forms since I began researching multiculturalism, patriotism and national identity as a graduate student. I was fortunate to have had the opportunity, while completing my doctoral work at Oxford, to convert some of my thoughts into Reclaiming Patriotism, which was published by Cambridge University Press in 2009. That book was an attempt to offer a statement of liberal patriotism aimed at an Australian audience. But having written it, and having survived the experience, I still felt that I should make a fist of offering a more elaborate defence of patriotic citizenship – one that would be of interest to scholarly audiences outside Australia. The Virtuous Citizen is the result.

Having its provenance in my graduate research at Oxford, this book would not have been possible without the generous support of a number of scholarships and awards: a Commonwealth Scholarship (British Council), a Jowett Senior Scholarship (Balliol College, Oxford), a Clarendon Award (University of Oxford) and a Pre-Doctoral Fellowship at the Centre for International Studies (Department of Politics and International Relations, University of Oxford). I thank the respective benefactors responsible for these awards.

As with any book, there are many people to acknowledge. David Miller supervised my doctoral thesis, and had it not been for his guidance and interventions, I fear I might still be struggling to complete the D.Phil. in some musty corridor in Holywell Manor at Balliol College. Those familiar with David’s work will detect his influence in this book. Marc Stears and Matthew Festenstein examined my D.Phil. and I hope I have paid sufficient attention to their thoughtful criticisms and suggestions. David Leopold was a generous tutor and supervisor during my time as a master’s student. And I cannot forget my debt to Ariadne Vromen, who patiently supervised me when I was an undergraduate honours student in Sydney, and just beginning to grapple with the philosophical and normative questions of citizenship in a multicultural society.

A number of friends and colleagues have kindly read drafts of this book in its successive iterations. I thank Dennis Glover, Matt Pennycook, Nicholas Farrelly, Nick Dyrenfurth, Inga Saikkonen, JanaLee Cherneski and Jessica Kimpell Johnson. Michael Stephenson was also a tremendous supporter during the concluding stages of my doctoral research. Since returning to Australia, I have been fortunate to enjoy two wonderful bases at Monash University and Per Capita. At Monash, Rae Frances, Jenny Hocking, John Arnold, Bruce Sates, Tony Moore and Keir Reeves have made me feel welcome as a research fellow and lecturer. In the final stages of writing, Kirsty Marshall helped put together the references for this volume at short notice. At Per Capita, David Hetherington, Anthony Kitchener, Josh Funder and Esther Lethlean have been most hospitable and supportive: I am especially grateful to David for allowing me to go on a period of leave to complete this manuscript, and to Anthony for always being a willing interlocutor on all matters political, literary and philosophical, however abstruse or unlikely. In 2011, I completed a six-month fellowship at St James Ethics Centre, which permitted me to spend time reflecting on the ethics of asylum and refugees in Australia. Simon Longstaff, Sally Treeby and Cris Parker were terrific colleagues and I hope I will have more opportunities to work with them. I am also grateful to Nick Cater, editor of The Weekend Australian. My weekly column for the paper during 2009–11 allowed me to reflect and expand on many of the issues dealt with in this book. Various chapters of the book have also been presented to audiences at Oxford, Keele, Deakin, Sydney and Australian National universities, whose comments have been useful.

Debbie Lee was, in the first instance, a great champion for this book at Cambridge University Press Australia when she was publishing manager there. At headquarters in Cambridge, which ultimately took over the project, John Haslam has offered much care and judicious attention. Carrie Parkinson, Elizabeth Spicer and Ed Robinson have also helped guide this book through the editing and production stages. Three anonymous readers provided incisive comments, which shaped my revisions of the original manuscript.

I offer my warmest gratitude to those closest to me. No amount of thanks will ever do justice to the love of my parents Thinh and Chanthavone, whose resilience, courage and generosity have inspired my thinking and continue to animate my work. My partner Sarah Hepworth has had to contend with The Virtuous Citizen as my formidable mistress. While I was finalising this book, there were many nights and weekends when she accepted, with a stoicism only love can sustain, that my mind would be rudely preoccupied with matters of political theory. And, finally, my thanks to my sister Sara, to whom this book is dedicated. This project began when I left Sydney for Oxford, when Sara was still a child, and is concluding just as she is becoming an adult and a citizen.
