Fantasy of Modernity

Romantic love overwhelms 1950s Bombay cinema. Love and romance is evident in the themes, lyrics and visual aesthetics of films of the period, as it is in the publicity and gossip surrounding films and film stars. Love in cinema becomes significant when social reality constrains its quotidian experience and expression. By bringing a spectacular imagination of love to centre stage, the 1950s cinema deflected anxieties of ‘Indianness’ even as the new aesthetic and affect of romance offered an alternative engagement with the contradictions of modernity. This book explores the films, the songs, the stars and the extra-cinematic discourse of the period to read love and romance as its most productive trope that mobilized a dynamic and contested public sphere.

Aarti Wani teaches at Symbiosis College of Arts and Commerce, Pune, India. She is the founding co-editor and presently lead editor of the international peer-reviewed journal Studies in South Asian Film and Media. Her research interests include Hindi and Marathi cinema, literary criticism, culture studies, gender and modernity.
Fantasy of Modernity
Romantic Love in Bombay Cinema of the 1950s

Aarti Wani
Contents

Acknowledgements vii

Introduction 1

- Love and the nation 2
- The 1950s 14
- Fantasy of modernity 20
- The city 26
- The song 29
- The stars 31

1. City of Love 34
   - Romancing the city 37
   - Limiting the city 61

2. The Song of Love 80
   - Love, governance and Barsaat Ki Raat (1960) 83
   - Erotics, gender and space 92
   - Self in separation 118

3. Love and Stardom 133
   - The affairs 141
   - Stars as models 152
   - The actress 163
   - Kagaz Ke Phool 170

Conclusion 184

Bibliography 198

Filmography 211

Index 215
Bombay cinema of the 1950s has had a special place in our cinematic consciousness. If its black and white magic, the timeless allure of its songs, the charm of its stars, seem unparalleled and the cause of popular nostalgia, it is also the decade that has been pivotal to film studies’ early engagement with Hindi cinema. Often considered foundational, the 1950s set the tone in terms of the themes, stories, music, forms and formulae that were to find currency through the later decades. Certain iconic films like Awara, Pyasa and Devdas that continue to be remembered and revisited in popular as well as scholarly writings give the period a certain gravitas as well as colour our perception of this cinematic moment as socially engaged and invested in the production of national identity. Indeed, it was this received understanding that drew me to the 1950s as it framed my initial engagement with the period. Soon, however, as I gradually delved into the fifties; the films, songs, stardom and the extra-cinematic discourse, I was struck by its extraordinary investment in romantic love, leading to an exhilarating discovery of some of the neglected and possibly subversive aspects of the cinema culture of the time.

I take this opportunity to thank teachers, friends, colleagues and family whose support, conversation and criticism have helped bring this work to completion.

I am grateful to Ranjani Mazumdar, who as the supervisor of my doctoral project took a keen interest in my work, shared ideas and books and imparted a sense of joy and discovery that is precious.

I am thankful to Patricia Uberoi and Geeta Patel, the external examiners of my doctoral dissertation. Their enthusiastic response and their insightful comments and criticism were pivotal to shaping the material into a book.

Jyotsna Kapur has not only been an extraordinary and generous friend, but over the years my work and I have gained immensely from the clarity of her aesthetic, cultural and political understanding and practice.

Varunika Saraf has been a friend and comrade throughout. I have learnt much about contemporary art from her understanding and practice of it. I am glad that I could rely on her warmth, attention and constant urging during the months the book was being processed.

A work such as this evolves in the midst of many formal and informal conversations in classrooms and seminars, over chai and lunches. I have benefitted immensely from the many passing observations, comments, insightful pauses and intriguing questions. For all this and more I want to thank Ira Bhaskar, Ravi Vasusdevan, Christine Gledhil, Kalpana Ram, Mukul Kesavan, Kamalakar Bhat and Aniket Jaaware. I also thank Ravi Kant for always replying to my queries regarding Hindi words and lyrics.
Acknowledgements

I thank Lawrence Liang for his advice on copy-right and fair-use law and Donald Fergusson of IASH, Edinburgh for teaching me a better way of taking screenshots!

I am fortunate to have friends, who not only share my interest in literature, art, cinema, culture and politics but also are great company to hang out with. A big thanks for the conversations and camaraderie to Alana Hunt, Rashmi Ranade, Kalyani Jha, Samrat Shirvalkar, Malavika Jha, Swati Jambhekar, Subash Jeyan, Avinash Jha, Ananya Parikh, Ipsita Sahu, Bindu Menon, Madhuri Dixit, Kishor Darak, Namrata Sathe, Nikhil Roshan, Shobhan Singh, Rutuja Deshmukh, Vasudev Menon, Anil Zankar, Sushma Kapur, Sahil kaloli, Rohit Bapat, Smita Mitra, Gaurang Ravibhan, and Vijay Kundaji.

A special thanks is due to Daniel Lindvall of Film International, who I have never met in person but whose friendship and interest in my work has been invaluable.

For their kindly support, I thank Anil Adagale, Neelofar Raina and all my colleagues and friends at Symbiosis College of Arts & Commerce.

My research at the NFAI was made especially easy, thanks to Mrs Joshi, Aarti Karkhanis and Laxshmi Iyer. Thanks are also due to the college librarian, Vaishali Vaidya, who has always been extremely dependable.

I am indebted to my editor at Cambridge University Press, Qudsiya Ahmed. It was her confidence in my work that propelled the polishing and completion of it into this book. Her alert and engaged editorial support is truly appreciated. Special thanks are also due to Anwesha Rana, for her efficient and concerned mediation in the process of publication. I also thank the anonymous reviewers at Cambridge for their insightful suggestions and commentary.

I thank my parents, Sulochana and Madhukar Wani for their uncompromising love.

I thank my brother Milind Wani for always being there. I have always taken his generosity and affection for granted. Thanks are also due to him for his careful reading of all the chapters.

Last but not least, this is for Isha, my star and anchor. I am glad for her steadfast and happy presence and it has been a bonus that she too shares a creative interest in that other love, cinema.