

Empire's Guestworkers

Haitian seasonal migration to Cuba is central to narratives about race, national development, and US imperialism in the early twentieth-century Caribbean. Filling a major gap in literature, this innovative study reconstructs Haitian guestworkers' lived experiences as they moved among the rural and urban areas of Haiti and the sugar plantations, coffee farms, and cities of eastern Cuba. It offers an unprecedented glimpse into the daily workings of empire, labor, and political economy in Haiti and Cuba. Migrants' efforts to improve their living and working conditions and practice their religions shaped migration policies, economic realities, ideas of race, and Caribbean spirituality in Haiti and Cuba as each experienced US imperialism.

Matthew Casey is Nina Bell Suggs Professor of History at the University of Southern Mississippi.

Afro-Latin America

This series reflects the coming of age of the new, multidisciplinary field of Afro-Latin American Studies, which centers on the histories, cultures, and experiences of people of African descent in Latin America. The series aims to showcase scholarship produced by different disciplines, including history, political science, sociology, ethnomusicology, anthropology, religious studies, art, law, and cultural studies. It covers the full temporal span of the African Diaspora in Latin America, from the early colonial period to the present and includes continental Latin America, the Caribbean, and other key areas in the region where Africans and their descendants have made a significant impact.

Series editors

George Reid Andrews, University of Pittsburgh
Alejandro de la Fuente, Harvard University

Empire's Guestworkers

Haitian Migrants in Cuba during the Age of US Occupation

MATTHEW CASEY

University of Southern Mississippi

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Cambridge University Press
978-1-107-12769-2 — Empire's Guest Workers
Matthew Casey
Frontmatter
More Information

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

University Printing House, Cambridge CB2 8BS, United Kingdom
One Liberty Plaza, 20th Floor, New York, NY 10006, USA
477 Williamstown Road, Port Melbourne, VIC 3207, Australia
4843/24, 2nd Floor, Ansari Road, Daryaganj, Delhi – 110002, India
79 Anson Road, #06-04/06, Singapore 079906

Cambridge University Press is part of the University of Cambridge.
It furthers the University's mission by disseminating knowledge in the pursuit of education, learning, and research at the highest international levels of excellence.

www.cambridge.org
Information on this title: www.cambridge.org/9781107127692
DOI: 10.1017/9781316412428

© Matthew Casey 2017

This publication is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2017

Printed in the United States of America by Sheridan Books, Inc.

A catalogue record for this publication is available from the British Library

ISBN 978-1-107-12769-2 Hardback

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party Internet websites referred to in this publication and does not guarantee that any content on such websites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate.

Contents

List of Figures, Maps, and Tables	page vi
Acknowledgments	vii
Introduction	I
Prologue: Experiencing the Unevenness of Empire	25
1 Making the Haitian Cuban Border and Creating Temporary Migrants	31
2 Leaving US-Occupied Haiti	61
3 Living and Working on Cuban Sugar Plantations	103
4 Picking Coffee and Building Families in Eastern Cuba	154
5 Creating Religious Communities, Serving Spirits, and Decrying Sorcery	180
6 Mobilizing Politically and Debating Race and Empire in Cuban Cities	205
7 Returning to Haiti and the Aftermath of US Occupation	235
Epilogue: Enduring Legacies and Post-Colonial Divergences	267
Bibliography	283
Index	309

Figures, Maps, and Tables

FIGURES

1.1	Cuban prison record for Aurelio Castillo	page 22
2.1	Image of damaged roads in southern Haiti	85
2.2	Image of flooded road between Aux Cayes and Port-au-Prince	86
2.3	A household in rural Haiti	88
3.1	A Cuban sugar central	106
3.2	A barracón on a property owned by The Cuba Company	109
3.3	A load of cane on a Cuban sugar plantation	112
4.1	View of a coffee farm in Oriente, Cuba	162
7.1	Pottery merchants in Port-au-Prince	259
7.2	Market in Port-au-Prince	261
E.1	Statue of Muerto	277

MAPS

2.1	Regional and temporal patterns of Haitian migration to Cuba	72
2.2	Areas of rural violence, mass land expulsion, and migration to Cuba	78

TABLES

1.1	Haitian immigrant arrivals in Cuba according to official statistics	45
1.2	Haitian passengers in Cuba, 1902–13	47
1.3	Haitian immigrants, net gain of passengers, and unspecified Antilleans, 1902–13	48
2.1	Haitian agricultural workers' birthplaces and migration dates	71

Acknowledgments

It is impossible to account for all of the time, resources, and intellectual energy that people have invested in me and this project for the past decade and a half. These acknowledgments must stand as my necessarily imperfect attempt to systematize the unquantifiable and express a gratitude that is ineffable.

The bulk of research for this project was funded by an Andrew W. Mellon fellowship and a Carolyn Chambers Memorial fellowship from the University of Pittsburgh. Before then, I received a Hays Summer Research Grant from the Department of History, a Tinker Grant from the Center for Latin American Studies, and a summer grant from the Center for Arts and Sciences, all from the University of Pittsburgh. My research at the University of Florida was funded by a Library Travel Research Grant from their Center for Latin American Studies. I would also like to thank the Vice President for Research and the College of Arts and Letters at the University of Southern Mississippi for funding the final stage of research.

In many ways, this book was inspired by questions that Aline Helg posed in an undergraduate seminar at the University of Texas in 2003: How can we overcome the linguistic fragmentation of the Caribbean? How have people experienced and responded to injustice and oppression in the region? The project itself began as a doctoral dissertation at the University of Pittsburgh under the supervision of Alejandro de la Fuente, Lara Putnam, Reid Andrews, and Jerome Branche. All four asked the hard questions, demanded scholarly rigor and mentored me as I carried out the research and writing. Alejandro believed in the project from the start, which was especially important in the early stages when some (including myself) questioned its feasibility; I owe my scholarly development to him and the others in this stellar group.

All of my colleagues at the University of Southern Mississippi have provided those concrete and intangible things that early career scholars need to thrive. Allison Abra, Kevin Greene, Andrew Haley, and Heather Stur read drafts of chapters and served as sounding boards for the ideas that follow. Douglas Chambers, Max Grivno, Bridget Hayden, and Andrew Wiest shared their experiences about the world of academic publishing and listened to specific questions and concerns on multiple occasions. As Department Chair, Kyle Zelner understood the importance of getting the book out and helped me juggle academic obligations accordingly. Andrew Ross and Rebecca Tuuri provided much-needed encouragement as I entered the final phase of revisions. I am thankful to these and all my colleagues for their collective mix of intelligence and good humor.

Over the years, a number of scholars have shared their time, expertise, and encouragement. Early on, Alejandra Bronfman, Marc McLeod, and Robert Whitney gave advice about Cuban archival sources. Thorald Burnham, Ada Ferrer, Leon Pamphile, and Matthew Smith did the same for Haiti. I have also benefited from conversations and correspondence with Alexis Alarcón, Barry Carr, Aviva Chomsky, Julio Corbea, Rafe Dalleo, J. Michael Dash, Luis Duno-Gottberg, Mercedes García Rodríguez, Yanique Hume, Mariana Past, Olga Portuondo, Kate Ramsey, Alyssa Sepinwall, Bernarda Sevillano Andrés, and Roberto Zurbano.

I had the great fortune of researching in Cuba at the same time as Jorge Giovannetti, who shared his extensive knowledge about the archives of eastern Cuba. Jorge is a model of scholarly generosity, who I seek to emulate in my interactions with other academics. On various research trips, I was grateful for the opportunity to exchange ideas about Cuban history and its street food with Takkara Brunson, Camillia Cowling, Anne Eller, Bayete Henderson, Benjamin Narvaez, Dan Rood, and Elena Schneider. My conversations in Santiago with Franny Sullivan about labor in the Cuban sugar industry and sources in provincial archives were especially fruitful. I also lucked out that Grete Viddal studies the descendants of Haitian migrants in Cuba. She seems to know everyone, has introduced me to a number of scholars in Cuba and the United States, and has read various versions of many pieces of this project. Her feedback and friendship have made this a better book. Finally,

Acknowledgments

ix

Orlando Rivero-Valdés has answered multiple questions about law and slang in the Cuban republic.

Oscar de la Torre, Dan Rood, and Michael J. Schmidt have been superlative exemplars of close friendship and academic support. With each of them I have enjoyed an alchemy of serious conversations and silly jokes over too much coffee or not enough beer. Their unconditional support and commitment to constructive criticism were crucial during the writing and publishing process. Michael read the manuscript right before first submission and identified areas that required clarification.

I had the opportunity to present parts of this work at a number of academic settings; a few stand out for the productive conversations they engendered. I received helpful comments on the future Chapter 6 at the Haiti and the Americas Conference at Florida Atlantic University in 2010. In 2012, Kate Ramsey, Tim Watson, and the participants at the Atlantic Geographies Institute at the University of Miami discussed what later became Chapter 5. In 2014, graduate students in Lara Putnam's Transnational Labor History seminar at the University of Pittsburgh read and discussed the entire manuscript with me. Thank you to all!

I owe a debt of gratitude to all the librarians and archivists in Haiti, Cuba, and the United States who shared their knowledge of source materials and often went out of their way to further my research. Ernest Even made my research at the Bibliothèque Haitienne on the St. Louis de Gonzague campus in Port-au-Prince both efficient and enjoyable. He allowed me to come in on some Sundays, when the library was technically closed. On my second day in Haiti, he facilitated my research at the Bibliothèque Nationale by introducing me to the director, Françoise Beaulieu Thibylle. There, I was fortunate to meet Pierre Moïse Celestin, who worked tirelessly to identify and track down Haitian newspapers on my behalf.

In Cuba, my research was supported by the Instituto de Historia de Cuba. There, Belkys Quesada helped me change visas and arranged for me to receive letters of access to libraries and archives throughout the island. In the Cuban National Archives, Julio López Valdés and Rafaela Curbelo shared their knowledge of the archives and patiently tracked down more than one document that could not initially be located. Thanks are also due to Berta Yaque, Isabel Oviedo Brita, and Lisset Guardia Parlá. Ileana Vicente Gómez, María Antonia Reinoso Morales, Miriam Benitez Silega, Roberto Ramos Sánchez, Abdel Masid, and Otto Sandoval Casals worked together to make the Archives in Santiago de Cuba the most unique place I have ever researched. Thank you to Reicel Hernández Guevara, Anielys Velozo González, and Lidia H. Díaz Barranco in the Provincial Archive of Camagüey, María Belén and Ana Leonor in the Provincial Archive of Holguín, and Yerenia Arias Mulet, Vicente Alvarez Morell, Olga Dovalés, Nélsida Santana, and Maritza Mendoza in the Provincial Archive of Las Tunas. Yadira Muñoz González helped me track down all of the Haitians in the marriage record of the Provincial Archive in Guantánamo, while José Sánchez Guerra loaned me some hard to find Cuban history books to read on nights and weekends. I also benefited from the newspaper indexing and great conversations of Margarita Canseco Aparicio and Iris Alvarez Martinez in the Provincial Library of Guantánamo.

Archivists at the United States National Archives in Washington DC and College Park, Maryland, helped me navigate the various collections concerning US activities in Haiti and Cuba. At the University of Maryland, Elizabeth A. McAlister facilitated my research in the Archives of the Cuba Company. My final research trip was to the University of Miami, where I was aided in Special Collections by Béatrice Colastin Skokan and in the Cuban Heritage Collection by María Estorino Dooling, Natalie M. Baur, Mei Mendez, and Rosa Monzón-Alvarez.

Special thanks to University Press of Mississippi for granting permission to republish portions of my essay “Between Anti-Haitianism and Anti-Imperialism: Haitian and Cuban Political Collaborations in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries,” which originally appeared in Haiti and the Americas (2013), edited by Carla Calargé, Raphael Dalleo, Luis Duno-Gottberg and Clevis Headley. Likewise, an earlier version of Chapter 3 was first published as “Haitians’ Labor and Leisure on Cuban Sugar Plantations: The Limits of Company Control” New West Indian Guide 82, no. 1 and 2 (2011):5–30.

A number of people opened their homes to me as I conducted research. The late Dr. Gerard Frédérique welcomed me into his Port-au-Prince home during a 2009 research trip. Lazaro Morales Menendez and Caridad Duarte provided a comfortable place for me in Havana, while María de la Caridad Botifort did the same in Santiago. In Santiago, José Manuel Sánchez Oliva and his family provided a loving environment where I could spend time when the archives were closed. José shared the details of his life and childhood as we walked the city on numerous evenings. In Washington DC, I was lucky to receive the hospitality of Gabriel and Kristin Assad as well as John Feather and Steve Parsons. Jay and Anna Marie Pousson and the late Hazel Casey opened their doors to Stephanie and me during a year we spent in Houston.

Acknowledgments

xi

A number of individuals helped me secure the images that appear in this book. Laurie N. Taylor at the University of Florida communicated with the National Archives of Haiti on my behalf and helped obtain permission to publish the images of damaged roads that appear in Chapter 2. Jennifer G. Eidson from the Hornbake Library at the University of Maryland retrieved and scanned the image of the barracón that appears in Chapter 3. I would like to thank Martha M. Ferriol Marchena from the National Archives of Cuba for her help securing permissions to use the images that appear in the Introduction and in Chapter 4. Finally, Stephanie Casey drew the maps in Chapter 2.

In Cuba, I had the opportunity to meet a number of Haitian descendants. Olivia Labady Chery opened her door to this stranger and talked at length with me about her family history, her work in Guantánamo, and her opinions about contemporary Haiti. She welcomed me into her Haitian Creole classroom as well. Likewise, Vida Lina Urgelles and the community of family and friends who gather in her home in Centro Habana always welcomed me with open arms. Vida Lina spoke with me on numerous occasions about her dance group, her religious beliefs, and her life story. I hope this book does justice to their histories and the work they are doing.

I am eternally grateful to Debbie Gershenowitz at Cambridge University Press for her willingness to take on this project and to Andrew Wiest for making initial introductions. It has been a pleasure to work with Debbie at every turn. Likewise, two anonymous readers pushed this manuscript in all the right directions. I am confident that the book is better as a result of their input. This would also be a good time to affirm that any and all mistakes or weaknesses in this text are my sole responsibility.

I owe a special heap of gratitude to my family. My parents, Shawn and Suggie Casey, had an unconditional faith in my ability to do this – a well of support from which I drew on numerous occasions of frustration and discouragement. Over the years, both have read drafts of chapters and page proofs of articles. My mom also read and copyedited the final version of the entire manuscript. I think it is safe to say that her red pen is the only mean thing about her. My siblings are awesome; Clifford Casey, Carolyn Figueroa, and Gina Casey have been exceptionally supportive in this endeavor and in everything else. My children, Hazel and James, have brought me immense happiness and I thank them for putting up with a dad who had a tendency to daydream about writing when I should have been paying more attention to the games we were playing.

There are a few hours every evening after the kids go to sleep when I can talk to my wife, Stephanie, without any interruption or distraction. These moments of quiet allow us to go over the big and small parts of the day and gear up for what lies ahead. Here we are in a similar quiet place in the acknowledgments, where I can reflect on our experiences together and express my gratitude for your love and support. Side-by-side we have endured Iliads and Odysseys – both big and small. Of course, we have shared even more moments of joy and contented peace together. Thank you for supporting me while I wrote this book – and all the before and after too. I love being your partner as we navigate this strange planet and raise our children together. They will someday be old enough to read this and make fun of me for sounding corny. I wouldn't want it any other way.