The Body of the Conquistador

This fascinating history explores the dynamic relationship between overseas colonisation and the bodily experience of eating. It reveals the importance of food to the colonial project in Spanish America and reconceptualises the role of European colonial expansion in shaping the emergence of ideas of race during the Age of Discovery. Rebecca Earle shows that anxieties about food were fundamental to Spanish understandings of the new environment they inhabited and their interactions with the native populations of the new world. Settlers wondered whether Europeans could eat new world food, whether Amerindians could eat European food and what would happen to each if they did. By taking seriously their ideas about food we gain a richer understanding of how settlers understood the physical experience of colonialism and of how they thought about the central features of the colonial project. The result is simultaneously a history of food, of colonialism and of race.

REBECCA EARLE is Professor of History at the University of Warwick. Her previous publications include The Return of the Native: Indians and Mythmaking in Spanish America, 1810–1930 (2008) and Spain and the Independence of Colombia (2000).

Critical Perspectives on Empire is a major series of ambitious, cross-disciplinary works in the emerging field of critical imperial studies. Books in the series explore the connections, exchanges and mediations at the heart of national and global histories, the contributions of local as well as metropolitan knowledge and the flows of people, ideas and identities facilitated by colonial contact. To that end, the series not only offers a space for outstanding scholars working at the intersection of several disciplines to bring to wider attention the impact of their work; it also takes a leading role in reconfiguring contemporary historical and critical knowledge, of the past and of ourselves.

‘But are there any sources?’, I was often asked when I explained that I was researching early colonial attitudes towards food. Sources in fact proved plentiful, thanks in part to the help of people such as Linda Newson and Frank Eissa Barroso, who found me documents from archives in two countries, and Jorge Cañizares Esguerra, Michael Hamerly, Jai Kharbanda, Irven Resnick, Cristián Roa, James Simpson and Deborah Toner, who drew my attention to particularly useful texts. Benjamin Braude shared his knowledge of the ‘African Ham’, Laura Lewis advised me on colonial magic and John Elliott helped me when I was foundering in the shallow waters of Spain’s sixteenth-century transatlantic trade. Leslie Tobias-Olsen and Magali Carrera assisted me in finding images and Richard Kagan discussed ‘pecker checkers’ over breakfast. I am also very grateful for the systemic advice offered by colleagues who read sections of this work – particularly Abel Alves, Emily Berquist, Andrea Cadelo, John Chasteen, Tony McFarlane, Jeffrey Pilcher, Claudia Stein and Guy Thompson. Many others allowed me to bend their ear about whatever bread-related conundrum was occupying my mind at the moment. I must also thank the staff at the lovely John Carter Brown Library for making my stay in Providence so pleasant, and the Library itself for granting me a fellowship. My fellow JCB ‘scholars’ Ari Zigelboim and Vin Caretta listened patiently to my daily reports on the intricacies of Catholic doctrine, and offered so much good advice that there is really no point attempting to enumerate it.

I am particularly indebted to my linguistically superior colleagues who shared their expertise in Latin, Greek and Nahuatl. Peter Pormann offered advice about medicine in the ancient world and generously translated swathes of Galen’s Greek. Mary Clayton, Erica Hosselkus and Camilla Townsend deciphered bits of Nahuatl, as well as, in Cami’s case, also helping me think about the project as a whole. James Muldoon translated passages of De Indiarum Jure and talked with me about Juan de Solórzano Pereira. And to say Andrew Laird helped me with the Latin bits would be a travesty of his contribution to this book. To all these friends and colleagues I am deeply grateful: thank you.

The beginnings, and completion, of this project coincided with difficult moments in my own life, and I would like, finally, to thank Lizzie Collingham, Cliff, Lisa and Susan Earle, Judy Foreman, David Mond, Thomas Seidel, Jennifer Smyth and Claudia Stein for being such good friends.
