This book breaks new ground by surveying and interpreting the hundreds of satirical poems and prose narratives published in Britain during the Romantic period. Although satire was a major genre with a wide readership, such works have been largely neglected by literary scholars satisfied that satire disappeared in the late eighteenth century.

Paying as much attention to now-forgotten figures like John Wolcot (“Peter Pindar”) and Jane Taylor as to Byron, Gary Dyer argues that contemporary political and social conflicts gave new meanings to conventions of satire inherited from classical Rome and eighteenth-century England. Situating these satires in their cultural and material context sheds light on issues such as the tactics satirists used to deflect prosecution for sedition, and the ramifications for women writers of satire’s “masculine” connotations. The book includes a bibliography of more than 700 volumes containing satirical verse.

This series aims to foster the best new work in one of the most challenging fields within English literary studies. From the early 1780s to the early 1830s a formidable array of talented men and women took to literary composition, not just in poetry, which some of them famously transformed, but in many modes of writing. The expansion of publishing created new opportunities for writers, and the political stakes of what they wrote were raised again and again by what Wordsworth called those “great national events” that were “almost daily taking place”: the French Revolution, the Napoleonic and American wars, urbanization, industrialization, religious revival, an expanded empire abroad and the reform movement at home. This was an enormous ambition, even when it pretended otherwise. The relations between science, philosophy, religion, and literature were reworked in texts such as Frankenstein and Biographia Literaria; gender relations in A Vindication of the Rights of Woman and Don Juan; journalism by Cobbett and Hazlitt; poetic form, content, and style by the Lake School and the Cockney School. Outside Shakespeare studies, probably no body of writing has produced such a wealth of response or done so much to shape the responses of modern criticism. This indeed is the period that saw the emergence of those notions of “literature” and of literary history, especially national literary history, on which modern scholarship in English has been founded.

The categories produced by Romanticism have also been challenged by recent historicist arguments. The task of the series is to engage both with a challenging corpus of Romantic writings and with the changing field of criticism they have helped to shape. As with other literary series published by Cambridge, this one will represent the work of both younger and more established scholars, on either side of the Atlantic and elsewhere.

Acknowledgments

Among the friends and colleagues I want to thank for their aid and advice are David Anderson, Daniel Bivona, Leslie Chard, David DeLaura, George Justice, Paul Korshin, Marjorie Levinson, Jack Lynch, Hugh Ormsby-Lennon, and Martin Wechselblatt. I would like to thank Janet Hearn, Linda Wahowski, and my parents for their continuous support. This book was written on a Kaypro II, a Kaypro 4, an IBM PS/2, and a Leading Edge 486; my gratitude to all three companies. The final version of this book has taken into account many suggestions offered generously by Marilyn Butler. I would also like to thank Josie Dixon and staff at Cambridge University Press. Lisa Maria Hogeland provided varied advice, including helping to resolve some qualms about part of the manuscript. Barbara Riebling read each chapter numerous times, occasionally in a deserted pizza shop, and helped enrich the work immeasurably. This book is very much a product of dialogue with her. Most of all, gratitude is due to Stuart Curran, who counseled me through several years of work on this project, and even lent me his old Kaypro 4, now rusting in my parents' cellar.
