Acknowledgments

All anthropological research is dependent on the anthropologist's informants. Many hundreds of people in Lyon gave freely of their time and allowed me to discuss with them the issues that formed the basis of this book. They are too many to thank individually, and it would be invidious to single anyone out for mention. In some circumstances it might also be against their best interests. I would, however, like to record my thanks to the Groupe Tiers Monde of Caluire for allowing me to consult material they collected in connection with a report on their commune.

Findings from my research have been presented to seminars at the universities of Amsterdam, Belfast, Cambridge, Durham, Kent, Oxford, Sussex, at the School of Oriental and African Studies and University College, London, to members of the Ethnic Relations Research Unit, Wandsworth, and in a variety of forms to meetings of the Social Science Research Council's "European" seminar. I would like to thank all who offered comments at those seminars, as well as the many others with whom I discussed my material, in particular two postgraduate students, Andrea Caspari, an anthropologist from Sussex, and Peter Jones, a geographer from Sheffield, who in the late 1970s undertook research in Grenoble and Lyon, respectively, in fields very close to my own. Richard Burton, a Sussex colleague, gave me guidance on numerous aspects of French social and racial thought, and A. L. Epstein offered me encouragement and the benefit of his considerable experience of urban anthropological research from beginning to end of this project.

The project would not have been possible without an initial grant from the University of Sussex to visit Lyon in 1974, and a generous award from the Social Science Research Council for fieldwork in 1975–6. I should like to express my gratitude to Irene Sheard and the staff of the School of African and Asian
