The growth in recent years of eighteenth-century literary studies has prompted the establishment of this new series of books devoted to the period. The series will accommodate monographs and critical studies on authors, works, genres and other aspects of literary culture from the later part of the seventeenth century to the end of the eighteenth.

Since academic engagement with this field has become an increasingly interdisciplinary enterprise, books will be especially encouraged which in some way stress the cultural context of the literature, or examine it in relation to contemporary art, music, philosophy, historiography, religion, politics, social affairs, and so on. New approaches to the established canon are being tested with increasing frequency, and the series will hope to provide a home for the best of these. The books we choose to publish will be thorough in their methods of literary, historical, or biographical investigation, and will open interesting perspectives on previously closed, or underexplored, or misrepresented areas of eighteenth-century writing and thought. They will reflect the work of both younger and established scholars on either side of the Atlantic and elsewhere.

Acknowledgments

This book was begun while I was a visiting lecturer at the University of Kent, and finished during a visiting fellowship at the University of Sussex; so I want to thank the Board of English Studies at Kent and the School of English and American Studies at Sussex for their hospitality and goodwill. My own University of Auckland has generously accommodated me with study leave, and the University Grants Committee of New Zealand assisted with microfilm costs in the early stages of the project. Michael Seidel's encouragement helped me (though he didn't know it) through a despondent patch and into the sunshine of a fresh start. The Bakhtin Group in the Auckland English Department constantly fed my enthusiasm for the theoretical side of fiction, and among its members I am particularly grateful to Claudia Marquis and Roger Nicholson for moral and technical support with the first draft. Without the help of my good friend Richard Winant, whose patience equals Job's, it would have been impossible to have solved problems of hardware and software.
