Acknowledgements

I wish to thank Professors Paul Kocher and Lawrence Ryan of Stanford University, who patiently guided the early development of this study. Their preference for literary parallels and resemblances, their scepticism about direct causes and effects, has strongly influenced its final form. Professor Kenneth Muir kindly read parts of the manuscript and asked stimulating questions about Marlowe and his contemporaries. I am especially grateful to Barbara Rosen for exposing hidden assumptions and challenging doubtful ones with so much tact and learning. Anne Barton and Michael Black offered many thoughtful suggestions about ways to assist the reader without simplifying the playwright. My dependence on the discoveries and arguments of other scholars will appear throughout text and notes. The greatest reckoning has to be made in a very small space: I hope to express some measure of thanks for continuing encouragement and criticism through the dedication to my husband.
