Acknowledgements

It is as important to express one's gratitude to those who have helped to bring a book like this to its final form as it is impossible to discern the extent of one's indebtedness to others. The book is based on the foundation of an education made possible by my mother, Jessie, and my late father, Sidney. Without their constant encouragement and willingness to forgo those things which would have made life a little easier for themselves, I would never have pursued my academic interests. This is the kind of debt one can acknowledge but never repay; one can only try to do the same for one's own children. And yet I am in debt to my children too. Emma and Martin have played no small part in this work. They have done much to try to keep me human and in touch with the realities of life when I might easily have retreated into an academic ivory tower. More than that, they have borne with a father who was sometimes distracted, tired and irritable, with remarkable cheerfulness and understanding. I owe them a great deal though they may not yet understand precisely why. I should also like to thank my parents-in-law, Rhona and Victor Cooper, for their constant encouragement and valuable insights into the nature of Seventh-day Adventism.

I owe much to the Board of Governors of Newbold College and to its administrators for generously granting me the opportunity to complete this research. The staff of the College library were enormously co-operative in making their resources available to me, and I am also extremely grateful to the staff both of the Ellen G. White – SDA Research Centre at Newbold College and of the Ellen G. White Estate in Washington, DC, for allowing me free access to the manuscripts and correspondence. My colleagues at the College consistently encouraged me with the thought that I was doing something which was worthwhile. If my work has some practical value for the Seventh-day Adventist church then that will in some measure repay the debt I owe to Newbold College.

A special vote of thanks must go to Harry Leonard of Newbold College and Dennis Porter of the Bodleian Library in Oxford for reading the manuscript in various forms and for making invaluable suggestions as to how to improve it. I owe a great deal to Bryan Wilson of All Souls College, Oxford, who supervised the present work in its original form as a D.Phil. thesis. His clear understanding of the religious impulse at work in people, and his constant availability for consultation were invaluable. In his use of the English language he set the highest of examples. His graciousness was oil on the wheels of the research process.

A number of people at various stages have helped me to prepare the manuscript. Particular thanks are due to Jonquil Hole, Alethea Mustard, Helen Savage and Margit Fuhrmann for their expert and willing help. More than that, I should like to thank them for their patience and amazing cheerfulness. I should also like to thank Ulrike Hellen, Alex Wright and Mary Baffoni of Cambridge University Press for their invaluable assistance in the final preparation of the copy.

Lastly, and most importantly, I want to thank my wife, Helen. She acted as a sounding board for new ideas. She gave comfort in times of discouragement. She kept our home on an even keel when I was distracted by the job in hand. She showed me new ways of looking at the world. But more than all that, she has helped me to be – I can think of no better way to describe her role in helping me to become capable of completing such an undertaking. Without her the book simply would not have been written, and I want to express my deep gratitude by dedicating it to her.

My indebtedness is great, the et alii includes many more people. Ultimately, of course, the judgements contained herein are my own. I trust that they will benefit the church about which they are written.
