GENERAL EDITORS' PREFACE

The aim of this series is to provide the text of the New English Bible closely linked to a commentary in which the results of modern scholarship are made available to the general reader. Teachers and young people have been especially kept in mind. The commentators have been asked to assume no specialized theological knowledge, and no knowledge of Greek and Hebrew. Bare references to other literature and multiple references to other parts of the Bible have been avoided. Actual quotations have been given as often as possible.

Within the severe limits imposed by the size and scope of the series, each commentator will attempt to set out the main findings of recent biblical scholarship, and to describe the historical background to the text. The main theological issues will also be critically discussed.

Much attention has been given to the form of the volumes. The aim is to produce books each of which will be read consecutively from first to last page. The introductory material leads naturally into the text, which itself leads into the alternating sections of commentary. By this means it is hoped that each book will be easily read and remain in the mind as a unity.

The New Testament series is prefaced by a volume—Understanding the New Testament—which outlines the larger historical background, says something about the growth and transmission of the text, and answers the question 'Why should we study the New Testament?'

EDITOR'S PREFACE

I wish to express my gratitude to the General Editors for their kindly help and advice, and especially to Professor A. R. C. Leaney for the invaluable assistance which he rendered in getting this book finally into shape. My indebtedness to innumerable other scholars will be apparent in the work itself.
