An author's debts are inevitably greater than he sometimes realizes. But some are so obviously significant that they deserve special mention. The research upon which this study is based began when I was a graduate student at Churchill College, Cambridge, working under the supervision of Jack Pole. His encouragement and incisive criticism, then and since, have been invaluable. Several others have read all or part of earlier versions of the book and have been generous in their advice. Without their help it would be much worse than it is. In particular, I would like to thank David Brion Davis, John Shy, Maldwyn Jones and William Brock. I have also benefited from the comments of the anonymous readers employed by the Cambridge University Press. From September 1965 until January 1967 I was a fellow of the American Council of Learned Societies, first at Princeton University and then at the University of Chicago. That support was invaluable as was the hospitality of the institutions which hosted me. Wesley Frank Craven at Princeton was especially generous in the time and assistance he gave me. Last, yet first, I dedicate the book to one whose help and support have been unstinting throughout, particularly during my more pessimistic moods.
