Preface

The present book originated as a Ph.D. thesis of London University, completed in October 1973. Particular thanks must therefore go to Professor C. Bazell, my thesis supervisor, who with his unique wealth of experience has helped me in countless ways. My gratitude to Professor Randolph Quirk, to whom I shall always be in debt for my introduction to linguistics in the first place, is no less pressing. Without his energy, encouragement, and continuing promotion, I should still be in an administrative job, barely knowing even the meaning of the word linguistics.

Perhaps inevitably, the most intangible debt is to one's every-day colleagues, to whom one airs one's views rather before they deserve the light of day. The people to whom such a debt is owing in this instance are Dr Anita Mittwoch, Dr Neil Smith, and Dr Deirdre Wilson, against whose acid criticism I have often had to defend myself—particularly in the early stages of the work for this book. To all of these, and to Professor Y. Bar-Hillel, Peter Cannings, Dr Dick Hudson, Professor Edward Keenan, Professor John Lyons, Professor F. Palmer, and Professor R. Robins, I am extremely grateful for the many and varied comments I received on earlier versions of the book. There remain to be thanked all those who have been my students in the last three years, since the majority of the arguments in this book have at some point been discussed in lectures, seminars and tutorials I have given. Needless to say however, there is unfortunately no one but myself that I can blame for the errors which still remain.

In connection with the preparation of the book for publication, I should like to thank the staff at Cambridge University Press for their unfailingly efficient help. And, on a more personal note, I must not forget to thank my husband, Michael Pinner, who had to show a more than usually generous measure of tolerance during the year in which the book was completed.
