I have made great demands on a vast number of people in preparing this book, and I have not been denied. I received help of various kinds from Brian Barry, Pierre Birnbaum, Jerry Cohen, Michael Evans, John Goldthorpe, Max Hartwell, Colin Lucas, Steven Lukes, David McLellan, Tim Mason, Zbigniew Pelczynski and Alessandro Pizzorno. I single out only three of my academic creditors. Alan Ryan, who was my supervisor during my doctoral research at Oxford, has helped more than anyone else with the content of the book. He mixes encouragement, rigorous criticism and a grasp of the point of such enterprises in a quite unique blend, and I am extremely grateful to him. Leszek Kolakowski, who replaced him for a time, gave me both insights and encouragement at a vital stage in the research. Philip Pettit has read the complete draft and helped by his comments and his enthusiasm. My wife Aveen has made it possible for me to devote the necessary time to this project over the last five years. She has provided all kinds of help, from encouragement to criticism of both style and content. Her support has been invaluable. I am grateful to University College, Dublin, for leave of absence while at Oxford, and to Nuffield College, Oxford, for electing me to a Research Fellowship during which I did the bulk of my research in highly conducive circumstances.
