This book has benefited from the generous assistance of many people. In particular I want to thank Martin Meisel and George Rowell for reading the manuscript and offering invaluable suggestions and encouragement. Their work on Victorian theatre, moreover, has in many respects made mine possible.

Some of those whose writing on Oscar Wilde I most admire have read the manuscript, or portions of it, and saved me from numerous blunders, both of omission and fact. I am especially grateful to Regenia Gagnier, Isobel Murray, E. H. Mikhail, and Peter Raby.

My colleagues at Miami University have been an unfailing source of help. Frank Jordan, Barry Chabot, Ann Ardis, and Peter C. Hall have read the manuscript at various stages and provided encouragement and good advice when I was most in need. William Wortman has been indispensable in helping to locate manuscripts and rare printed plays without which this book would have been impossible.

I also owe a major debt to many staff members at the British Library, the New York Public Library, the Mander and Mitchenson Collection, and the Theatre Museum, as well as Miami University libraries. I am grateful to English Literature in Transition 1880–1920 for permission to use a chapter, “Wilde and Ibsen,” which appeared in a shorter and earlier version in that journal. Permission to use photographs from various theatrical productions of the 1890s has been kindly granted by the Mander and Mitchenson library, the Theatre Museum, London and the Victoria and Albert Museum. Much-needed time and financial support for this project were made available by the National Endowment for the Humanities, the faculty research committee at Miami University, and the college of arts and science and department of English at Miami. Trudi Nixon prepared the manuscript for publication with her usual expertise.
