ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I am grateful to the friends, colleagues, and institutions that supported and advised me while I was writing this book. My greatest debt is to Cecil Y. Lang, whose wit, learning, and charm have endeared him to all who know him. His support has been invaluable to me, as it has been to so many other members of our profession. I have also profited from my close association with Anthony Winner, a reader whose great intelligence is matched only by his integrity. Two scholars of the sublime inspired me by their examples and supported me with their friendship – Thomas Weiskel and Samuel Holt Monk. They are greatly missed. William Andrews, Harold Bloom, Janice Carlisle, Paul Fry, Phillip Herring, Margaret Homans, Robert Kellogg, Alan Liu, Janet McNew, Julie Rivkin, Eric Rothstein, Ronald Wallace, and Joseph Wiesenfarth read parts of this study at different stages in its composition and offered helpful comments. Over the years, in countless conversations, George Bradley, John Casey, David Field, Diderik Finne, Kim Rogal, Peter Taylor, and Craig Smyser have given me many valuable ideas.

The English Department of the University of Wisconsin–Madison has provided an excellent atmosphere in which to work. For this, and for the friends I have made there, many thanks. I also want to thank the Graduate Division of the University of Wisconsin for two summer research fellowships and the American Council of Learned Societies for a grant, given with the assistance of the National Endowment for the Humanities, that enabled me to spend a much needed year in Boston working on this book. The Houghton Library at Harvard generously allowed me access to its collections of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century literature. I am also grateful to the editors of ELH for permission to reprint the material in Chapter 7, which appeared in an earlier form in their pages.

The debts that it gives me greatest pleasure to acknowledge are to my parents, for all their years of support, and to Ellen Wright Clayton, to
