Businessmen have always had a strong inclination to avoid competition and regulate the market. Helen Mercer traces the evolution of British competition legislation designed to discourage such practices, from 1900 to 1964. Textbooks frequently attribute the dynamic behind the development of this legislation to an undefined 'public opinion'. Helen Mercer disagrees. She contends that competition policies have been shaped by the strategies of powerful business interests – at home and in the United States. Trade unions and organisations of labour have provided a consistent pressure on governments to legislate on private monopoly, in the face of sweeping criticisms of free enterprise. This book makes extensive use of archival sources to give a detailed analysis of government–industry relations. In the course of this it sheds new light on Britain's changing industrial structure, and offers pointers to the likely outcome of business regulation in Britain in the future.

Acknowledgements

First of all I must acknowledge two major intellectual debts: to my father, Eric Mercer, and to my partner, George Hallam, who have shaped my understanding of economic history. In addition, my father has made innumerable suggestions on drafts of the book, and my partner has been an unfailing source of enthusiasm and encouragement, ideas and insights. On the subject matter of this book I have been much influenced by the pioneering work of W.A. Williams and Gabriel Kolko.

Much of the original research for this book was undertaken in completion of my doctoral thesis, supervised by Geoffrey Jones then at the Business History Unit, London School of Economics, now at Reading University. It was made financially possible by an ESRC linked studentship for two years and by the academic support provided by the Business History Unit under Leslie Hannah. I would like to thank them for their support at that early stage. Since then I have received much help and advice on draft chapters for the book. At Leeds University Malcolm Sawyer made invaluable suggestions on a draft of the book, and Mike Collins read the whole thesis before I started revisions, also being very encouraging. I would also like to thank the many people who have commented on my work over the years and given their support, and especially Jim Tomlinson, Neil Rollings, Larry Butler, Katrina Honeyman, Peter Nolan and Kathy O'Donnell. Needless to say, I alone am responsible for all mistakes, hyperbole and polemic.

Many people involved in the events described here agreed to be interviewed, although not all are cited. In this regard I would like to thank Dame Alix Meynell, Mr William Hughes, Lord Thorneycroft, Dame Elizabeth Ackroyd, Sir Alan Neale and Mr Raymond Colegate. Denys Gribbin, who has worked on this area for the war-time period gave me valuable help at the start of my thesis.

I owe a special debt to the staff of the Public Record Office, Kew, for their willingness to answer my requests and for the general service that they provide. I would also like to thank the archivists and librarians at the Modern Records Centre, Warwick University, the British Library of

I would finally like to thank my family for their patient support, and special thanks to my daughter for reasons too numerous to mention.
