Acknowledgements

Many people have helped me in the pursuit of this research. I owe a massive debt of gratitude to my two Ph.D. supervisors, Dr Michael Mann and Dr Gavin Mackenzie, both of whom provided encouragement and advice during the collection and analysis of the data in this research. Dr Mackenzie has had an enormous influence on my sociological career ever since those far off days in January 1970 when he supervised my reading of Durkheim, Marx and Weber. He assisted the early periods of this research up to and including much of the data collection. Dr Mann took over supervision upon Dr Mackenzie's departure to Harvard University for a year's sabbatical. He provided a great deal of encouragement and advice during the writing of this research. I count myself extremely fortunate to have enjoyed working with two such excellent supervisors.

I should also like to thank the many social scientists in Cambridge who have assisted and encouraged this research. In particular, I should like to thank Bob Blackburn, John Barnes, Geoffrey Hawthorn, Sandy Stewart, Ken Prandy, Geoff Ingham, Cathy Marsh and last, but not least, John Holmwood. My thanks also extend to the many people in Rochdale who helped me, either by providing access to data or answering my many questions. I trust that the clergymen, trade unionists and librarians will feel that it was all worthwhile. I wish to thank Mr and Mrs H. Hemingway and Mrs E. Johnson for their help, hospitality and encouragement – my greatest sadness is that none has lived to see the final draft. I hope that they would have regarded it as a good piece of research.

Particular thanks go to Lesley Bower, who provided invaluable assistance at the beginning of the research and to Sylvia Langford and Heather Salt for their typing of the successive versions of this manuscript. I would like to thank Frank Bechhofer for his helpful critical comments on my Ph.D. dissertation, Mike Hutchinson of Lancaster University Library for much help and Alan Ainsworth for his comments on many aspects of this research. Press have been both helpful and sympathetic to an inexperienced author. My sister, Alison and brother-in-law, David and my father have all helped in many ways over the years and my son, Michael and daughter, Sarah have been remarkably patient and quiet while the final version of the manuscript was written. My greatest debt, inevitably, extends to my wife Brenda, whose assistance and encouragement has been tireless and constant. It is to her that I dedicate this book.
