Preface

The essays that form this volume were all offered originally as papers in the Colloquium in Social Theory at the University of Washington. The series on Marxism and the Good Society began in 1973 when, through the generosity of the Institute for Comparative and Foreign Area Studies (now School of International Studies), the Colloquium was able to invite participation by scholars from outside the University of Washington. They, like the local members who contributed, were asked to treat some aspect of the general theme. In balancing outside and local contributions, we sought also to balance the subject matter between more purely theoretical studies and examinations of actual postrevolutionary situations. Although some of the local contributors now find themselves elsewhere, this book reflects both kinds of balance embodied in our original plan.
