I do not know if most books are as indebted to the generosity of readers as this one is. From the largest conceptions to the most minute matters of style, readers have told me what they liked and what they did not. My earliest readers were also those from whom I probably stole most freely: Philip Kuberski, Robert Gregory, and Nina Schwartz. The processes of reading and revision have made it difficult in places for me to tell my own work from theirs. That experience has been the most optimistic confirmation of the thesis of this book. I must also thank my former teachers, Alexander Gelley and John Carlos Rowe, who in their early readings of my manuscript chose encouragement over caution in their advice. And the careful reading John Paul Riquelme gave an intermediate version of the text contributed greatly to what economy the book now displays.

During the long process of revision, I often doubted the patience of Cambridge University Press. The occasional but dependable good-humored encouragement of Andrew Brown and Terence Moore's practical advice were valuable supports. It is hard to acknowledge the anonymous readers the Press found to read and evaluate versions of this book. They were a source of advice I had not expected, but their comments were instrumental to the ultimate shape this book took.

Earlier versions of two chapters of this book, on The Scarlet Letter and on The Unnamable, have appeared in Criticism and Boundary 2, respectively.
