

Contents

Part I: Theory and experience

- 1 The terms of reference 3
- Is reading fiction good for you? If so, who chooses the fiction? – the main characteristics of children's novels – their style and morality – the identity of both in No More School and Pilgrim's Progress – moral values and individualism – the necessity of fiction in the creation of values – its closeness to gossip and everyday storytelling – individual and social identity confirmed by stories – the development of each in relation to language – the main dimensions of values and the facts of value-change in the modern world – novels as an effort to help children into that world and its future.
- 2 Looking back into the blank of my infancy 37
- A reading autobiography – a brief psychology of fiction – learning to see and learning to imagine – Wordsworth and our memory of stories – how much do we remember and what do our memories make us into? history and popular culture – the importance of comics in my early memory: Dandy, Wizard, etc. – the values embodied in boys' adventure stories – John Buchan and the public schoolboy – the experience of wartime in peacetime Britain – Kipling and tearfulness – poetry and stirring effects – the use made of heroes – the place of domesticity, home, and parents – Arthur Ransome and P. G. Wodehouse.
- 3 The history of children –
little innocents and limbs of Satan 70
- A short history of the modern idea of childhood – origins in late eighteenth century – previously little known – The World We Have Lost and seventeenth-century childhood – frequency of death but no evidence of uncaringness – relations of family size to economic conditions – growth of leisured middle class and nursery childhood (Ariès) – limitations of new 'psychohistory' – two moral traditions of Victorian upbringing – nineteenth-century creation of family as 'haven' – relevance of Freud and Marx – new children's novelists and best adult

Cambridge University Press

978-0-521-27070-0 - The Promise of Happiness: Value and Meaning in Children's Fiction

Fred Inglis

Table of Contents

More information

viii

CONTENTS

novelists alike in view of Victorian society – private life and the progress of consumer society.

Part II: Texts and contexts: the old books*4 The lesser great tradition 101

A critical study of some of the best of Victorian and Edwardian children's novels – Alice, girlhood and Oxford – Beatrix Potter and Victoria – The Secret Garden and Romanticism – The Railway Children and political economy – The Wind in the Willows, home and friendship.

5 Class and classic – the greatness of Arthur Ransome 124

Class as a social category – the babytalk Marxist – Marx himself and changes in class definitions since he wrote – Arthur Ransome as last great Edwardian – his class biography and the classless summer holiday – sailing and sea-going as model ways of life – Joseph Conrad's Shadow-Line and Ransome's Swallowdale – We Didn't Mean to Go to Sea as his best novel and a classic.

6 Girl or boy: home and away 146

Masculine and feminine virtues in Edwardian literature – manliness and courage – The Prisoner of Zenda – imperial adventure and King Solomon's Mines – Kipling and boyhood at the end of the Empire – Treasure Island's absence of sanctimony an antidote – girls as objects of desire – the sexual mythology of Rebecca – Laura Ingalls Wilder's The Long Winter – the political excellence of American life for girls.

7 Let's be friends 172

Friendship in mass society – Charlotte's Web and the unsolicited gift of friendship – The Wheel on the School and the knowable community.

8 Cult and culture: a political–psychological excursus 182

Criticism or escapism? the forms of popular culture – the difficulties of the term 'escapist' – fantasy which does or does not permit reflexive thought – the phenomenon of Enid Blyton – her happy safety – Tolkien and Lord of the Rings – its great power and falsehood – the superiority of The Hobbit – Watership Down both popular and reflexive – a new classic.

Part III: Paradise lost and paradise regained: the new work*9 History absolves nobody – ritual and romance 213

Historical novels and the Tolkien formation – their origins in contrasting social formations – old style adventure story: crusader, cavalier, Nelson's midshipmen – Rosemary Sutcliff's Roman novels and new historical depths – K. M. Peyton, Flambards and the social change from

Cambridge University Press

978-0-521-27070-0 - The Promise of Happiness: Value and Meaning in Children's Fiction

Fred Inglis

Table of Contents

More information

CONTENTS

ix

- 1912 to 1920—the liberal hope for a new society—Gillian Avery, The Warden's Niece and how an individual understands history—Penelope Lively, history as messages, The House in Norham Gardens—William Mayne, The Jersey Shore, and the presence of the past.
- 10 Rumours of angels and spells in the suburbs 232
 Myths, faery, and Tolkien's successors—schoolteachers and the revival of interest in the supernatural—the political meanings of magic—Alan Garner's first two novels and their staginess—The Weathermonger and the critique of industrial life—Elidor and scientific language—Earthsea and the relations of language to magic—Ted Hughes, The Iron Man and industrial myth.
- 11 Experiments with time and notes on nostalgia 251
 Time as problematic in modern experience—its relation to the self—science-fiction and Mayne's Earthfasts—understanding time by comparing different points of history—Tom's Midnight Garden—modern Tom and Edwardian Hatty—the significance of older people's reminiscences for children—The Children of the House and the 1914–18 war again—another ideal home in Carrie's War.
- 12 Love and death in children's novels 271
 Innocence and loss—what should children be told of sex and death?—the terrors and pleasures of a dose of the horrors—the social realist school of children's novelists—telling too brutal truths—The Chocolate War—The Slave Dancer and telling the shameful history of racism—death and loss—Beat the Turtle Drum—reticence and modern sexuality—the difficulty of decorum not overcome in Red Shift—the strength of A Long Way from Verona arising from its not being written to a thesis.
- 13 Resolution and independence 292
 Dickens as the model to set before children's novelists—the range of his language and the inclusiveness of his social understanding—Midnight is a Place and The Mouse and His Child as compared with the Dickensian qualities—tragedy and comedy in children's experience—the place of laughter in relation to both—storytelling and making sense of the world—fiction as a mode of public thought.
- Bibliography* 312
Index 325