Acknowledgements

The basic material for this book was gathered in different parts of the Soviet Union from 1960 to 1975, eventually materialising as a PhD thesis for the University of Birmingham. My thanks are due particularly to my former colleagues and team mates at Progress Publishers, Moscow, Yuri Sdobnikov and Len Stoklitsky, for firing my enthusiasm yet harnessing my energy; they are, of course, not a whit responsible for any of the views I express. I am also indebted to the USSR–Great Britain Society in Moscow for facilitating my sports visits to the Baltic republics and Central Asia, and to Progress Publishers for enabling me to work in sports schools, be an active member of Spartak, study in the archives of the Moscow Physical Culture Institute and visit many other Soviet cities.

I owe it to David Lane for initially suggesting this theme to me and to Brian Bicat for his valuable comments on my final draft. Most of all I would like to record my gratitude to two people without whom this study would probably have not been completed, despite their contempt for almost all forms of physical exercise: Geoffrey Barker and my wife, Rashida. As my research supervisor, Mr Barker read my numerous drafts so thoroughly that the thesis eventually grew to nearly a thousand pages. But for his criticism and advice, the book would lack much of the analysis, continuity and readability demanded of any book in this series. If it were not for the encouragement, selfless labour and Tatar obduracy of my wife, I should spend all my free hours playing instead of writing about sport. With the greatest respect and affection, I thank them both.
