Acknowledgments

The work on this book advanced despite numerous temptations to loiter along the way. At several critical junctures I received the kind of institutional and financial support that enables a scholar to devote himself wholeheartedly to his trade. I spent the spring semester of 1980 at the Shelby Cullom Davis Center for Historical Studies at Princeton University. Having arrived there with a vague aspiration to explore what seemed distinctive, if not unique, about German culture, I left with a thematic focus and a research agenda. My thanks to Lawrence Stone and his colleagues in the Department of History and to the other Visiting Fellows, who offered needed encouragement and were eager to share ideas. Three research trips to Germany were hosted by the Max-Planck-Institut für Geschichte in Göttingen. I join a long line of visiting scholars who have enjoyed the unusually generous hospitality of Professor Rudolf Vierhaus and his colleagues, notably Hans Erich Bödeker, Alf Lüdtke, Hans Medick, Jürgen Schlumbohm, and David Sabeau. Supported in part by a fellowship from the American Council of Learned Societies, I spent the academic year 1983–84 at the National Humanities Center in the Research Triangle, North Carolina. It would be hard to imagine a more conducive environment for beginning a long writing project. The solicitude and efficiency of the center's staff were much appreciated, and special thanks are due several colleagues there – William Bouwsma, Timothy Breen, Jack Censer, Gladys Lang, and Kurt Lang – for bearing with my initial efforts to shape a coherent argument.

Doctor Walter Brod, the Institutsleiter of the Institut für Hochschulkunde, kindly arranged for a visit to Würzburg that proved both pleasant and fruitful. Frau Anneliese Bruns, the secretary of the Universitätsarchiv in Göttingen, oriented me to the archive and never once evinced skepticism about my seemingly endless requests for files. I was also fortunate to explore (all too briefly) the library and archive of the Franckesche Stiftungen in Halle. Other visitors will concur that Herr Jürgen Storz, the keeper of the these treasures, is a rare combination of Gemütlichkeit and expertise.

As important as the sojourns in Germany were, I conducted a good deal of the research at home. That I was able to do so is testimony to the competence and the tolerance of the interlibrary loan staff of the D. H. Hill Library at North Carolina State University, Raleigh.

Fritz K. Ringer helped sustain the project with his encouragement and his expertise. Four scholars – Charles McClelland, Gail O'Brien, Mack Walker, and K. Steven Vincent – read the manuscript in its entirety and improved it with gentle but constructive criticism. As each chapter materialized, Steve Vincent assumed the onerous responsibility of confronting me with its shortcomings. More critical, though, was his confidence in the viability of the larger project, particularly as I found myself leaving the terra firma of social history and entering a meandering course through the history of ideas. I thank him for his patience as well as his acumen.
