The communities of south coast New Guinea were the subject of classic ethnographies, and fresh studies in recent decades have put these rich and complex cultures at the center of anthropological debates. Flamboyant sexual practices such as ritual homosexuality have attracted particular interest. In the first general book on the region, Dr Knaft reaches striking new comparative conclusions through a careful ethnographic analysis of sexuality, the status of women, ritual and cosmology, political economy, and violence among the region's seven major language-culture areas. The findings suggest new Melanesian regional contrasts and provide for a general critique of the way regional comparisons are constructed in anthropology. Theories of practice and political economy as well as postmodern insights are drawn upon to provide a generative theory of indigenous social and symbolic development.

Acknowledgments

The ethnographic analysis of south coast New Guinea has been a captivating field of study. My greatest acknowledgment is to the intrepid ethnographers who produced such detailed studies of this region during early decades of ethnographic research. Their timely commitment to extended fieldwork was extraordinary and carried out under logistical conditions that are difficult to fully appreciate from our own late twentieth-century vantage point.

Second, I owe an intellectual debt to those contemporary scholars who have rekindled anthropological interest in the regional analysis of south New Guinea, and in particular to Gilbert Herdt, Harriet Whitehead, Shirley Lindenbaum, and Daryl Feil. Though this book is in part a critique of their work, it stands on their shoulders, and I have great respect for their efforts.

Third, I thank several persons who have commented with care and insight on previous versions of this manuscript, in particular, Fredrik Barth, James Carrier, Donald Donham, Simon Harrison, Terence Hays, Gilbert Herdt, Raymond Kelly, Stuart Kirsch, Sherry Ortner, Andrew Strathern, James Weiner, Harriet Whitehead, anonymous press reviewers, and the members of the 1990 ASAO "Migration and Transformations" symposium. Their insights have helped sharpen my portrayals and analyses, though they bear no responsibility for this book's shortcomings. Members of my home Department of Anthropology at Emory University provided intellectual stimulation and logistical support; a thanks goes to all of them. Thanks also go to Jessica Kuper, anthropology editor at Cambridge University Press, and to Kathleen Much, editor-in-residence at The Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Stanford.

I thank Carole Welp for verbally translating many parts of the Dutch depopulation report and John Richens and Carol Jenkins for bringing publications concerning early Marind-anim medical history to my attention. The Crosier Missions supplied me and the Emory Library important publications concerning Asmat; relatedly, the comments of David Eyde and Tobias Schneebaum were helpful as I wrote the Appendix. Unpublished information on the presence or absence of ritual homosexuality in various south New Guinea societies was graciously supplied by Robert Depew, Peter Dwyer, Stuart Kirsch, Billai Laba, and Robert Welsch. Reference suggestions from James Baker and Anton Ploeg concerning particular aspects of west New Guinea history are acknowledged with appreciation. A large thanks goes to Deanna Knickerbocker for producing the map, to Robin Mouat for drawing the figures, to Lynn Gale and Judy Robertson for computer help in formatting the index, and to Marie Cantrell for help in proofreading. Great and cheerful help procuring bibliographic materials was given by Margaret Whittier and the Inter-Library Loan staff at Emory's Woodruff Library, by Kathryn Creely from The Melanesian Studies Resource Center at The University of California Library, San Diego, and by the several library staff members at The Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Stanford, California.

Permission to quote liberally from previously published materials is gratefully acknowledged from Ethnology, Grove Weidenfeld Press, Kluwer Academic Publishers, Macmillan Press Ltd, Oxford University Press, Stanford University Press, The University of Chicago Press, and Van Gorcum Press. A special thanks to Tobias Schneebaum, Mark Sexton, and the Peabody Museum of Salem, MA for permission to use their photograph of an Asmat ancestor skull on the cover of this book. The photograph (original in color) was taken by Sexton; it was printed in Schneebaum's Embodied Spirits: Ritual Carvings of the Asmat, (p. 50), published and copyrighted in 1990 by the Peabody Museum of Salem, MA. The skull, obtained from Buepis village, is from Schneebaum's personal collection.

The Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford provided the ideal intellectual and logistical environment for the completion of this book during a fellowship year in 1991–92. My fellowship support from the Center was provided by their National Science Foundation Grant BNS-8700864 and supplemented by matching salary support from Emory University. Funding support for earlier phases of this research project was supplied by the Harry Frank Guggenheim Foundation in the form of a research grant and a Career Development Award. Funds for summer research in 1989 were received from the Emory University Research Committee.

My final and deepest thanks go to my colleague and wife, Eileen Cantrell, and to my son, Eric. They have given me more energy to complete this project than they realize.
