ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book is the second volume of Noel Butlin's posthumous economic history that began with Economics and the Dreamtime, published by Cambridge University Press in 1993. This book covers the economic history of the colonial economy until about 1840. The perspective it takes is shaped by two important issues — labour and capital — and the account begins with two extended essays on these themes. From this point, the book develops an account of the economic growth of the several settlements, and develops an estimate of the overall level of economic activity including both the Aboriginal and colonial populations.

Noel Butlin died before completing the full account. What is included in this book is the material as he left it, taking into account various corrections, ambiguities, checking and bibliographical amendments. The picture is complete except for an account of the first major depression in Australia, the economic collapse of the 1840s. The notes to the beginning of that chapter sketch out the intended direction of the analysis, and preface the incomplete material that he left. The material and its suggestions for further work are left for other scholars of Australian economic history to take up.

The generosity of Jules Ginswick, initially in providing access to a substantial body of unpublished work and subsequently in clarifying and correcting material used in this volume, is gratefully acknowledged.

Thanks are due to a number of Noel Butlin's former colleagues at the Australian National University. Wayne Naughton took on the task of checking all the tables and provided invaluable technical help, while Barry Howarth put together the bibliography. Graeme Snooks provided helpful comments on structure and content, and assisted with resources. The financial support from the Reserve Bank of Australia and the Australian Research Grants Committee is also gratefully acknowledged.

I would record my appreciation of the efforts of Cambridge University Press, and Robin Derricourt and Marion Fahrer in particular, for their efforts in this project.

Note: While every effort has been made to provide accurate references (in the text) and sources (for the tables and figures), a number of these were incomplete at the time of the author's death and have not been able to be located.
