1 Introduction

'The first decade of Frederick William III's reign', Heinrich von Treitschke writes, 'is the most traduced and least-known epoch of Prussian history'.<sup>1</sup> Indeed, H. M. Scott describes the whole fifty-year period from 1763 to 1806 as 'one of the most neglected half-centuries in Hohenzollern history'.<sup>2</sup> The relative obscurity of the period from 1797 to 1806 can be explained by the fact it is apparently untypical of what we are accustomed to think of as typically Prussian. The early reign of Frederick William III lacks the clear contours of the Great Elector's state-building; the stern militarism of Frederick William I; the unprecedented expansion of Frederick the Great; and the later achievements of the Prussian reform period after 1806. Unlike many other periods, the years from 1797 to 1806 saw Prussia shock Europe not by her assertiveness, but by her quiescence, not by her contempt for international norms, but by her trusting belief in such norms long after they had been abandoned by her neighbours; and when Prussia was punished in 1806, it was not for her aggression, but for her diffidence. Yet – as this book attempts to show – Prussian statesmen before Jena did not regard themselves as untypical. They were no less beholden to the doctrine of the primacy of foreign policy, and the demands of geopolitics, than their predecessors or successors. The decisive difference lay not so much in the unspoken assumptions underlying Prussian deliberations, but in the resulting responses: timidity, indecision, opportunism, miscalculation, high-political intrigue, royal preference and sheer necessity sustained the neutrality policy until the bitter reckoning at Jena and Auerstedt. The years 1797 to 1806 thus constitute a unique alternative narrative of Prussian history in which the price of passivity

Method: the primacy of foreign policy; geopolitics; high politics; the antechamber of power

The chief theoretical inspiration behind this book is the primacy of foreign policy. First articulated by Ranke and refined by Dilthey,<sup>3</sup> the primacy of foreign policy soon rose to a position of near hegemony, not merely in late-nineteenth century German historiography but in public life as well. ‘Foreign affairs’, Bismarck announced in 1866, ‘are a purpose in themselves. I rate them higher than all other matters.’<sup>4</sup> Some fifty years later Hermann Oncken could declare without serious risk of contradiction that the primacy of foreign policy was not merely a ‘dynamic basic law’ of German political life, but ‘a biological statement of fact’.<sup>5</sup>

Soon after, Wilhelm Mommsen was merely reflecting the consensus view when he said that it was the duty of the historian to ‘hammer the notion of the “the primacy of foreign policy” into every German brain’.<sup>6</sup> In short, the concept of the primacy of foreign policy has both historiographical and political implications. In the political sense – as in Wilhelmine or Weimar Germany – it signifies a prescriptive demand for the strict subordination of all other matters to the external security of the state; this aspect need not concern us here. Used historiographically, on the other hand, the concept can be purely descriptive; it records but does not necessarily endorse the decisive role played by foreign policy – and its resulting internal consequences – in the historical development of the Prusso-German state.

Like all interpretative frameworks, the primacy of foreign policy involves a set of basic assumptions about the historical process. First of all, it postulates that international relations are conducted quite independently of ideological and societal considerations.<sup>7</sup> ‘There is no trend of opinion, however dominant’, Ranke writes, ‘which can break the force of political interests.’<sup>8</sup> Hence the primacy of foreign policy not merely allowed the state to override domestic opposition, it also sanctioned agreements with ideological adversaries abroad. Secondly, the emphasis on foreign policy is justified by the ‘irrevocability’ of decisions in that sphere.<sup>9</sup> Whereas erroneous domestic policies could be reversed, there was no appeal from the harsh arbitrament of partition, annexation and war. Consequently, the historian must focus on the 'moment of decision' in international relations.<sup>10</sup> It is this emphasis on drama, not longue durée, which distinguishes the primacy of foreign policy from the more gradual explanatory models of Marxists, modernisation theorists and others. Thirdly and relatedly, the primacy of foreign policy insists that the outcome of a given historical situation is always 'open', never pre-determined;<sup>11</sup> hence the focus on the moment of decision and the free will of the protagonists. 'Political history', as Jacques Julliard has written, 'measures the contribution of voluntary actions in the unfolding of history'.<sup>12</sup> However, fourthly and paradoxically, the primacy of foreign policy also stresses the constraints on human volition and the dictates of 'necessity': an external threat may be so acute as to nullify free will and admit of only one course of action. This tension between freedom and necessity has repeatedly been referred to by both critics and champions of the primacy of foreign policy, but it has never been satisfactorily resolved.<sup>13</sup>

If the primacy of foreign policy was mainly deployed to describe Prussia-Germany's historical role within the international state system, it also served to explain her constitutional development. 'The degree of independence', Ranke wrote, 'determines a state's position in the world, and requires that the state mobilize all its inner resources for the goal of self-preservation. This is its supreme law'.<sup>14</sup> 'The internal history of a state', Dilthey maintained, 'is entirely determined by its external experience'.<sup>15</sup> Politically, this argument was used to counter demands for political reforms in late nineteenth-century Germany. Bismarck spoke for many when he insisted that one first had to make a house safe from the (external) elements before addressing specific questions of interior decoration.<sup>16</sup> Historiographically, it encouraged the tendency to see the internal development of Germany as a function of her foreign-political position. ‘Perhaps the most powerful motive for the great domestic reforms of the era of enlightened absolutism’, Dilthey wrote, ‘was the need to mobilize resources for the external struggle through the most intensive cultivation of all spiritual and material strengths of the state.’ The degree of possible internal freedom, J. R. Seeley maintained, was inversely proportional to the external pressure on its borders.<sup>17</sup>

This link between foreign policy and internal structure was put on a sound empirical footing by Otto Hintze.<sup>18</sup> Hintze’s theories were a direct challenge to Marx, and all those who saw the historical process in purely endogenous terms; he argued that the constitutional development of a state was also powerfully influenced by its relations with other states. ‘As a result of constant rivalry and competition between themselves’, Hintze wrote, ‘individual states find themselves forced into a continuous intensivisation and rationalisation of its administrative apparatus.’<sup>19</sup> In particular, Hintze focussed on the search for efficient institutions – military, administrative and executive – to facilitate the formulation and execution of foreign policy. Of course, while internal cohesion might be a necessary response to external pressure, it was far from automatic; but the fate of the German Reich and Poland between 1772 and 1806 showed that the result could be political extinction.<sup>20</sup>

Until the outbreak of the First World War, the primacy of foreign policy was generally interpreted to the disadvantage of broader popular political participation. ‘The main determining factor for our monarchic-constitutional system of government’, Hintze argued, ‘lies in the fact that we are surrounded by the greatest military powers on the continent and that an enormous military-political external threat faces our long and unprotected borders. Strict internal cohesion is necessary in order to withstand this pressure; and this strict cohesion demands a primarily dominatory, that is to say monarchical spirit in our governmental and administrative system.’<sup>21</sup> During the later years of the Weimar Republic, the controversial German lawyer Carl Schmitt took this theme a step further in his attack on the parliamentary system. Instead of ‘government by discussion’, Schmitt demanded a ‘decisionist’ executive; when the preservation of the state was at stake, he argued, any decision was better than none.<sup>22</sup> But the link between foreign-political strength and authoritarian rule was not an immutable one. During the Prussian Reform period (1807–1815/19), for example, the demand for agrarian, economic, social and constitutional changes was justified by the need to free Germany of Napoleon and restore Prussia to her rightful place in the European pentarchy of powers. During the First World War and after, Max Weber, Otto Hintze and others came to realise that the foreign-political salvation of the Reich could only be achieved through greater popular political participation. ‘Only he who sees internal politics from the perspective of its inevitable arrangement according to the needs of foreign policy’, Weber argued, ‘is a politician. Those who do not like the “democratic” consequences which come from this should do without the great power policy which they require.’<sup>23</sup> After 1918, Hintze claimed that Seeley's dictum about the relationship between external pressures and internal freedom now had to be reversed.<sup>24</sup> In short, as Karl Rotthaus pointed out, there was no 'correct' form of government per se; what mattered was whether a given system served the foreign-political purposes of the state or not.<sup>25</sup>

Wem die daraus folgenden “demokratischen” Konsequenzen nicht passen, der verzichte auf eine Großmachtspolitik, die sie unvermeidlich macht’ (p. 192).

Despite serious challenges from Karl Lamprecht and Eckart Kehr, the primacy of foreign policy remained the dominant theoretical model until the 1960s; thereafter, it came under increasing attack from a younger generation of German historians. Their objectives were both political and methodological. Politically, these critics took exception to the apologetic baggage of the primacy of foreign policy, which potentially excused not merely Germany's aberrant behaviour on the international stage, but also her illiberal constitutional arrangements.<sup>26</sup> The primacy of foreign policy, in Ziebura's view, was thus an 'anti-democratic ideology'.<sup>27</sup> Methodologically, the objection was to the neglect of social and economic forces; the emphasis on the 'moment of decision' – it was argued – obscured the deeper, long-term forces at work in the historical process.<sup>28</sup> These differences were comprehensively aired in the Fischer controversy about German responsibility for the First World War, which was in turn part of a much wider debate about the relationship between foreign policy, society and elite manipulation throughout the Wilhelmine period. Indeed, far from conceding a primacy of foreign policy, the new generation of historians argued for a 'primacy of domestic policy' – Primat der Innenpolitik – according to which Germany's external relations were instrumentalised to perpetuate the status quo at home. No clear victor emerged from this debate. On the one hand, the new social history of politics rapidly established itself as something of a 'new orthodoxy' until itself attacked from the left towards the close of the 1970s. On the other hand, the pendulum has now begun to swing back towards a more self-consciously political interpretation of key events in German history. This shift has been most marked for the Wilhelmine period,<sup>29</sup> but it is also evident for Revolutionary and Napoleonic Germany. ‘If ever there was a country whose history was moulded by international relations’, Tim Blanning writes, ‘it was surely Prussia.’<sup>30</sup> Indeed, the more reductionist doctrines of the Primat der Innenpolitik have long since been retracted by some of its most passionate advocates.<sup>31</sup> But what is beyond all doubt is that societal historians have so far advanced no serious interpretative framework of their own to explain foreign policy; they have admitted as much themselves.<sup>32</sup>

The second theoretical inspiration for this book is the fraught and problematic concept of ‘geopolitics’. Of course, the idea of a close relationship between geography, politics and history has a very long tradition. ‘La politique des états’, Napoleon famously remarked, ‘est dans leur géographie’; history, Herder writes, ‘is geography which has been set in motion’.<sup>33</sup> But the (pseudo-) science of ‘geopolitics’ – as championed by Ratzel, Haushofer, Kjellen, Mackinder and others – only emerged around the turn of the century. In its crudest form, ‘geopolitics’ was a geographically determinist variant of the primacy of foreign policy in which the interest, fears and policies of the state were merely a function of its location on the map. ‘Man and not nature initiates’, Sir Halford Mackinder wrote, ‘but nature in large measure controls’.<sup>34</sup> On this reading, the geographic centrality of Germany in general and Prussia in particular – the German Mittellage in Europe – explained not only her aggressive foreign policy, but also her unique constitutional development. The widespread fear of encirclement (Einkreisung), the idea of preventive war, and the maintenance of authoritarian politics at home, so the argument ran, simply reflected the laws of geopolitics. ‘The German Mittellage’, Hermann Oncken wrote, was the ‘fundamental fact of our national existence’.<sup>35</sup> Even such a liberal figure as Franz Schnabel spoke of the ‘particular geographic burden (Belastung) of Germany’.<sup>36</sup>

This sense of Germany’s unique geopolitical exposure was buttressed by the comparison with Britain. Historians such as Otto Hintze, Hermann Oncken and Gerhard Ritter distinguished between ‘insular’ and ‘continental’ state forms; Carl Schmitt spoke of ‘Land’ and ‘Meer’.<sup>37</sup>

Whereas the ‘insular’ location of Great Britain permitted the development of a representative political culture, the ‘continental’ situation of Prussia-Germany compelled her to achieve the internal cohesion necessary to survive in the predatory international system. Similarly, whereas Britain could concentrate on a remunerative maritime foreign policy, Prussia-Germany was entirely focussed on the mainland of Europe. While Britain could afford to uphold the European balance of power at a safe distance, Prussia-Germany enjoyed no such latitude. Indeed, it is not difficult to sense the suspicion, hostility, but also envy in Fritz Wagner’s description of British policy during the French Wars of 1792 to 1815. ‘Until the fall of Napoleon’, he wrote, ‘British capital was active in inciting one state after another, and even the peasants of remote mountain valleys, to launch a war of liberation . . . while Britain enriched herself at the expense of European colonial property overseas.’<sup>38</sup> British observers, of course, saw things differently. According to Spencer Wilkinson, the ‘historical function of Great Britain’ was to ‘hold the balance between the divided forces which work on the continental area’.<sup>39</sup> Indeed, to quote Alfred Thayer Mahan’s graphic image, Britain’s role during the Napoleonic period was that of a ‘fruitful mother of subsidies, upon whose bountiful breasts hung the impoverished and struggling nations of the continent’.<sup>40</sup> On this reading, Prussian behaviour throughout the period resembled that of a rebarbative infant, resentfully suckling on a patient and maternal Britain.

The obvious apologetic implications of geopolitical arguments often obscured their intrinsic explanatory power. For this reason, criticism of geopolitics has tended to be part of a much broader assault on traditional political history in general, and the primacy of foreign policy in particular. Historians such as Hans-Ulrich Wehler, Gilbert Ziebura, H.-D. Schultz and Jürgen Kocka objected both to the idea of geographic determinism itself and to its exculpatory potential. The Mittellage, Schultz argued, was merely an intellectual stratagem designed to ‘turn perpetrators into victims'.<sup>41</sup> After all, as Kocka pointed out, both Poland and Switzerland were located in the heart of Europe but had developed very differently from Germany; this reference to Poland turned out to be something of an 'own goal'. Moreover, as Gilbert Ziebura argued, geopolitical 'constraints' could hardly be reconciled with the simultaneous insistence on the free will of states and statesmen characteristic of traditional political history.<sup>42</sup> These were telling criticisms, but they had already been anticipated. As far back as 1921, Karl Hoffmann had understood that foreign policy 'rests on a continuous tension between space and the human will'.<sup>43</sup> Some fifty years later Klaus Hildebrand – a traditional but non-determinist political historian – stressed that a rigidly geopolitical view risked underestimating the role of human agency in the historical process.<sup>44</sup>

In any case, far from being buried by the tide of historiographical progress, the idea of geopolitics has undergone a remarkable renaissance in recent years. At the theoretical level, this has been most evident in France, where Yves Lacoste has set up a course in 'geopolitics'.<sup>45</sup> In Germany, the revival of geopolitical models has been led by Immanuel Geiss and Gregor Schöllgen.<sup>46</sup> But even more traditional empirical historians such as Wolf Gruner now routinely refer to the importance of
