Acknowledgements

This book had an earlier life as a doctoral thesis, completed in the Department of History, the Faculties, Australian National University, in 1990. That thesis was revised between 1993 and 1994 with the support of an Australian National Research Council Postdoctoral Fellowship in that same department. My first debt is to that department and that university, and to the ARC, for giving me the opportunity to pursue this work.

The many friends and colleagues who helped and encouraged me in the long process of working on that thesis deserve my thanks here, once more, together with those who have taught, worked, studied or talked with me since then. For their criticism and generosity, thanks especially to Joanna Bourke, Neville Cain, Donald Denoon, John Knott, Brij Lal, Stuart Macintyre, Allan Martin, Hank Nelson, Peter Read, John Rickard, Alison Smith, Bruce Smith, Barry Smith, Kosmas Tsokhas and Marivic Wyndham. My thanks also to many of my students who might not know how much they have meant and given to me. I am deeply grateful for all the support I have always had from my parents. I want also to remember here two of my great encouragers, Manning Clark and Michael Lanchbery, who in very different ways gave me the confidence to undertake this work. Yet I would not have got very far if I had not had the great fortune of Ian Hancock as supervisor. Now, some ten years on, I would like to promise him I will try to move on to something new, but he knows how stubborn I can be.

Phillipa McGuinness at Cambridge University Press thought there might be a book here, Peter Spearritt and Peter Browne began knocking it into shape, and Carla Taines had the considerable challenge of neatening it/me up. Many thanks to them.

None of the above will agree with all that is in these pages: that is my responsibility. But they all helped make it possible.

I am grateful to Harper Collins Publishers Australia for permission to reproduce in chapter two the extract from James McAuley's 'New Guinea'.

Earlier versions of the following chapters have been published elsewhere: chapter one in David Walker (ed.), Australian Perceptions of
