Acknowledgements

This book could never have been written without the help and support of a number of institutions and individuals. My greatest debt is to the British Library (North Library), where I spent every school holiday over the last few years and whose staff worked miracles for me, aware of the very real constraints imposed upon provincial readers. I am also much obliged to Michael Carrier for encouragement and the practical support of an academic librarian, without whom the index would have proved impossible, and to Douglas Webster for the meticulous proofreading that only a true scholar can provide. Comments made by John Morrill were gratefully received and acted upon, and the sixth form students of Withington Girls' School had a double input: I valued them as 'guinea pigs' for some of the more difficult material and was kept at the task by their genuine enthusiasm to see their teacher in print.
