Acknowledgments

The writing of labour history will always be a collective effort. Thanks are due to the many trade unions who provided access to their records and the state archives and libraries of Victoria, South Australia, Queensland and New South Wales. I owe a particular debt to the National Library, the University of Melbourne Archives, the Noel Butlin Archives of Business and Labour and the Henry George League in Melbourne for permission to work through (then) uncatalogued collections.

Many people read parts of the manuscript in its long evolution. Thanks are due to my PhD supervisors, Marian Quartly and John Rickard, and examiners, Robin Gollan and John Merritt. I also thank Geoffrey Bolton, Verity Burgmann, Clyde Cameron, Ann Curthoys, Graeme Davison, Eric Fry, Jenny Lee, Lenore Layman, Mandy Leveratt, Martyn Lyons, Susan Grogan, Alan McBriar, Ewen Maidment, Stuart Macintyre, Charlotte Macdonald, Barry Reay and Julie Wells. I am grateful for the encouragement of my associates in the Society for the Study of Labour History especially Barrie Dyster, Terry Irving, Greg Patmore, John Shields and Lucy Taska. I acknowledge the support of the various institutions I've worked in in both Australia and Aotearoa/New Zealand and thank my students for daily reminding me of the importance of the past.

Cambridge University Press brought all this work to fruition. I thank the Series Editors and in particular Pat Grimshaw who recognised the potential of the project, Phillipa McGuinness who never lost faith in it, the (anonymous) reader, Heather Jamieson, a patient and persevering copy editor and Jane Farago and the production and marketing team, who are a credit to an outstanding press.

Above all, I thank my family. Frances Anderson, Kathleen and Michael Prentice, Kit Vale, Karen, Michael and Robert Scates and the Flemings all offered accommodation and support at research centres across the country. My children, Bill and Alex, grew up with this book; my own parents knew much of its personal cost. Finally, I thank my partner, Rae Frances, a true companion in History and a wise and loving friend.
