and unselfish reading of the typescript at a point when I could hardly bear to continue enabled me to imagine for the first time that my pages were a book. My sister Betsy has warned me for years that I had better write this book so that she could read it, and that injunction has haunted every line I revised. But the most profound debt must go to Nina Schwartz, who has probably read the typescript more often than I have and showed me how to improve every page. During discussions with her, the clarity of her mind repeatedly illuminated my thesis when I worked myself into a dark confusion. I cannot imagine having completed this book without her help.

Because books also require material assistance to be written, I need to acknowledge the research leave SMU granted me in 1994–5, which gave me the time I needed to write the second half of the book. The external and internal readers for Cambridge University Press commented with wonderful thoroughness and insight on the typescript and helped me clarify numerous elements of my argument. In addition, I would like to thank the following institutions for granting permission to include versions of previously published essays: Oxford University Press for “Pleasure and Community in Cultural Criticism,” ALH (1994): 371–82; the Arizona Board of Regents for “Re-Poe Man: A Problem of Pleasure,” Arizona Quarterly 4 (1990): 1–26; Duke University Press for “Alphabetic Pleasures: The Names,” SAQ (1990): 395–412; and the Modern Language Association of America for “J. G. Ballard’s Empire of the Senses: Perversion and the Failure of Authority,” PMLA (1993): 519–32.
