FOREWORD

The text of the letters in this volume and its successor represents a revision of that published five years ago in the Oxford Classical Texts series. The difference in character between the two editions is accountable for some changes, but more are due to reappraisals made in the process of translation and annotation. Problems of dating in this part of the correspondence are particularly difficult, and further study has led me to a number of departures from the traditional chronology which I followed in 1961.

In the apparatus criticus of the two volumes already published I normally mentioned only those conjectures which were printed in the text, leaving others to the commentary. In deference to advice I have now relaxed this rule.

Since the fifth and sixth volumes of this edition are appearing before the third and fourth, readers of the commentary will find references to notes which have not yet been published. For this inconvenience, which I hope will be slight and temporary, I must apologize.
