

ACTRESSES AND WHORES

The image of the actress as prostitute has haunted the theatrical profession since women first went on the stage. Kirsten Pullen explores the history of this connection both in the cultural imagination and in real life. She shows, through case studies of women working in Britain and the United States between the seventeenth and twentieth centuries, that some women have drawn on the dual tradition of “whore” as radical and victim to carve out a space for female sexual agency. Female performers from Elizabeth Boutell and Charlotte Charke to Mae West redefined gender identity and appropriate female sexuality. Pullen integrates substantial archival research and interviews with working prostitutes with a consideration of feminist and cultural perspectives on the myth and reality of the actress/whore. This highly original study offers many new insights to theatre historians and scholars of cultural, social, and gender studies.

KIRSTEN PULLEN is Assistant Professor of English Studies at the University of Calgary.

Acknowledgments

Like all books, mine is the culmination of conversations with friends, colleagues, and mentors. I am grateful to all those who shared drinks, books, pound cake, and brunches where we wrote notes on napkins – the social and scholarly activities that make us academics. Henrik Borgstrom and Juliette Willis made important contributions to my early thinking and writing. The book began as a dissertation, and the brilliant members of my dissertation writing group, Jessica Berson, Ann Linden, Carrie Sandahl, Lisa Yaszek, and especially Jami Moss contributed a great deal; if there are sentences that sing, phrases that ring true, analyses that elegantly argue, they were probably worked through by one or more of these remarkable women. At the University of Wisconsin-Madison, Professors Julie D’Acci, Jack Kugelmass, Michele Hilmes, and Philip Zarrilli generously gave their time and energy to different phases of this project. My advisor Mike Vanden Heuvel and committee member Sally Banes provided examples of the kind of scholar and teacher I hope someday to become; their personal and academic support made this book possible. Though I benefited and borrowed from all these people, any mistakes and omissions are my own.

This book also owes an enormous debt to the sex workers whose stories I include. These women and men agreed to tell me their experiences working in prostitution, a decision often fraught with emotional and possibly physical peril. Because they lived, worked, and even studied in the same small city where I wrote my dissertation, their contributions were especially generous. My interview subjects were concerned with anonymity, and their names, agency names, and identifying details have been changed in order to preserve their privacy. I hope only they will recognize themselves in these pages.

As the dissertation became a book, editor Victoria Cooper was unfailing in her support and accommodation. She chose reviewers who made thoughtful and helpful comments. The book is much stronger because my anonymous reviewers indicated productive avenues of research, thinking, and theorizing. I am grateful for their otherwise unacknowledged help. I also thank Kristine Krueger at The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, Erin Pauwels and Marcus Risdell at the New York and London offices of the David Garrick Club, Kathleen Coleman at The Harvard Theatre Collection, and Tim Bower for help locating and securing permission to use several of the illustrations included; Maartje Scheltens at Cambridge also deserves thanks for her help.

My sister, Heidi Pullen, and her partner, Clark Stroupe, provided citations and vacations. My parents, Carl and Norma Pullen, offered unwavering emotional, intellectual, and financial support. I owe them more than I can ever repay. Finally, Josh Heuman has lived and breathed this book with me. Though not always graciously accepted, his suggestions were always gratefully applied. I could never have written this book without him, and reward his dedication to my project by dedicating it to him.
